OFS wants more staff to lobby province

PETERBOROUGH — The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) yesterday established guidelines for expanding the organization into a well-heeled lobby group and organizer for students at the provincial level. This move comes at a time when increases in tuition fees looms as a distinct possibility.

Delegates to the two-day OFS general meeting voted to work towards a nine-member staff, including four fieldworkers, two researchers and an information coordinator.

The increased staff would establish closer contact with member student councils and work to increase awareness of OFS activity among the general student population of Ontario.

It would also continue to provide an effective student lobby at Queen's Park, and establish closer links with other provincial bodies involved in education, trade unions and community work.

OFS currently employs only three people who must perform lobbying, research and communications work for a constituency of over 100,000. "We can only provide a maintenance of the status quo" complained one of the current staff.

To finance the proposed expansion, student councils, which are members now or which will be joining, will conduct referenda on their respective campuses in the next year. The referenda will ask students to affirm membership in OFS by authorizing a levy of $1.50 per student to be collected in addition to regular student council fees.

The University of Western Ontario in London will be the first to have such a referendum. Students there will go to the polls in less than three weeks. U of T's SAC is currently discussing the proposal with the referendum tentatively set for March 13 and 14.

Present OFS funding is levied on student councils directly on the basis of 40 cents per registered student.

"During the past year, we have done several concrete things to justify the forty cent fee" OFS researcher Paul Axelrod said

"We have established valuable files of useful material for student councils. We've put out two province-wide newspapers and we've presented a well documented brief to the (Ontario) Committee on University Affairs.

"Unfortunately, our credibility with the government is greater than with the students. We must make a concerted effort to make OFS known to the students," Axelrod said.

In addition, OFS delegates voted to mount a "forceful organizing campaign" against any attempt by the provincial government to increase tuition fees again.

The desire for such a campaign followed a meeting last week between OFS representatives and Colleges and University Minister Jack "Flash" McNie. McNie refused to commit himself on any aspect of future governmental intentions regarding post-secondary education.

Tuition fees increased by $100 for the 1972-73 academic year. The government's COPSEO report, recommended sharply increasing tuition fees along with easier access to greater sources of loans

Internal affairs to begin examining code

With the dust barely settled from Thursday's Governing Council meeting, council's internal affairs committee takes up the discipline code this afternoon with an eye toward amendments and deletions.

Today's meeting is the first step along the yellow brick road as prescribed by Governing Council leading to council's March meeting when the code is to come up again for formal approval on implementation.

Internal affairs committee is supposed to "review" the code with amendments and deletions.

Later on, a special joint meeting between the academic affairs committee and the internal affairs committee is to deal with the structures and procedures for implementing and administering the code.

While those committees are working on the code, a special "task force" consisting of students faculty and members of the two committees are to meet "to review proposed changes and make recommendations" to the committees.

The two committees, on which students are a minority, are under no obligation, however, to listen to or to follow any recommendations made by the task force.

The task force will probably be the body around which much of the negotiations between students and the administration will take place.

Chaired by internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway, the task force is to consist of one representative each from internal affairs and academic affairs and two faculty members from the U of T Faculty Association.

In addition there are to be six students, two each from SAC, GSU and APUS.

It is from this swirl of committee and task force meetings changes in the discipline code are to be made, according to the motion passed by Governing Council.

Vietnam ceasefire repeatedly ignored: report

By ANDREW FALUDY

A year ago a ceasefire was supposed to have come into effect in Vietnam. But the fighting has not stopped since all parties to the ceasefire have repeatedly violated the agreement.

These are some of the findings of a 50-page report recently released by the Indochina Resource Center in Washington, D.C.

Entitled the "Breakdown of the Vietnam ceasefire: the need for a balanced view," the report documents violations by all parties concerned using press and government sources on both sides of the war as evidence.

The report says: "The US is guilty of: failure to dismantle military bases; infiltrating 10,000 military men disguised as civilians, continuing reconnaissance flights over North Vietnam and PRG territories; aiding Saigon's imprisonment into concentration camps of thousands of Vietnamese living in Saigon controlled zones; and of giving out incomplete lists of military prisoners."

The report continues: "In addition, the Saigon government has been releasing none of the civilian prisoners covered by the Paris accords."

The prisoners referred to in the report have been variously estimated as numbering between 100,000 and 300,000.

No one knows exactly how many are being held because the Thieu government has reclassified many of them as common criminals or changed their names.

Amnesty International, an organization which works specifically on behalf of political prisoners around the world give a figure of 100,000 political prisoners in South Vietnam out of a total population of over 18 million.

Nancy Pocock, who works for the International Committee to free South Vietnamese Political Prisoners from Detention, Torture and Death, is concerned about their fate.

"Their treatment is getting worse," she said in an interview yesterday.

"There is more torture and repressive treatment now than ever before."

Pocock visited Hanoi in October and is convinced a workable settlement could be reached if only the US would withdraw its support from South Vietnam.

Or, as her husband John Pocock puts it, "very few people know that $750 million went into Vietnam last year."

"There are more 'civilian' personnel in South Vietnam now than during the Kennedy era."

The report corroborates this statement when it quotes from a New York Times article printed in April of last year.

"The US has left behind over 10,000 military personnel disguised as civilian advisers." US officials acknowledge "less than 9,000 civilian personnel, most of whom are filling logistics and maintenance functions for the South Vietnamese army."

Nancy Pocock believes US work in aiding the Thieu government's policy of keeping vast number of people in prison is prolonging the war.

"This gives the Thieu government control. The prisoners' families are afraid to do anything for fear of reprisals."

Wouldn't all this put a considerable strain on the economy?

"Not when you have friends like the US" she said. "The US also helps to train the prison guards."

"If the US would withdraw its military support, the Vietnamese could work it out between themselves.

"There would be a third force in Saigon: a large body of Vietnamese who are neither pro the Thieu regime or the communists."

"These people would be open to reconciliation."

Nancy Pocock says neither the PRG or the Hanoi government would provide impediments to peace.

"North Vietnam is short of about a millions homes."

"In Hanoi we saw factories and textile plants completely bombed out."

"There is no doubt in my mind that both the PRG and Hanoi are ready for and looking forward to peace."

Bring on the entrepreneur

Old Adam Smith must be chuckling in his grave. The energy crisis in the US has brought forth a new breed of entrepreneur, the underground oil dealers.

Laissez faire capitalism dies hard in the Great Republic, and the black market fuel dealers have provided a text book case of supply and demand.

It has gotten to the point the US government's Federal Energy Office has launched investigations into clandestine offers of astronomical quantities of fuel—at astronomical prices, of course—made to airline companies.

One of the favorite systems for making a quick buck on the energy black market is for the budding speculator to offer an outrageous quantity of oil to some fuel starved company or organization, and contract the deal without in fact having any fuel.

Then the speculator dashes about the country looking for specified quantity of fuel to supply to his customer. Sometimes it works sometimes it doesn't.

The whole system apparently works because a few smaller refineries can refine more fuel than the government requires under its allocation program.

The refinery then auctions off its surplus to the highest bidder. The bidder then takes all and in turn sells it at even higher prices to whomever is willing to pay.

Another source of extra fuel apparently is from European countries not under the pinch from Arab countries. Small oil companies and independent operators are the importers, and they in turn auction off their goods to the highest bidder.

One cloak and dagger meeting in Houston, reputed to be the centre of the black market goings-on, reportedly drew a dozen people prepared to bid on a billion gallons of gas slated to be delivered over 27 months

Oil prices will drop they say

Two Canadian economists predicted over the weekend the high price of Mideast oil cannot last because less profitable sources would be encouraged by high prices and that would undermine the current price structure. Management studies professor David Quirin of U of T told a conference on oil and the Middle East in Toronto the marginal production capabilities of other countries than the Mideast would be spurred by higher prices.

He said it would be "unlikely" oil prices of $12 to $16 would be sustained, and even had reservations about and $8 to $10 price range lasting for an extended period of time.

U of T professor Leonard Waverman also predicted a drop in oil prices saying Canada's federal and provincial governments have over-reacted to the energy crisis.

He predicted new oil sources commanding $6 a barrel at wellhead which would double the oil companies' return.

In the Varsity of Fri. Jan. 18, we erroneously reported in a front page story on U of T chancellor Pauline McGibbon that International Business Machines (IBM) was the sole supplier of University of Toronto computers. IBM does supply all the computers for the U of T Computer Centre, with 15 pieces of equipment in seven locations. There is, however other computer equipment on campus supplied from other sources.

Also, in the Fri. Jan. 25 Varsity, we reported that a small package of cigarettes was sold at U of T facilities for 75 cents. This information came from the concessions at the arena and stadium, but further information revealed that it is a large package that sells for 75 cents.

Levitt speaks to Gov Council

The following is the text of a speech given by student governor Howard Levitt last Thursday at the Governing Council meeting. Levitt spoke against the proposed discipline code.

The last few years have represented a tragic history of the faculty and administration maintaining their ascendancy in this institution and using it to suppress the demands of students—demands that have been, for the most part, both reasonable and well-ennunciated.

Time and time again, the administration has put itself in a position where it gained and warranted the distrust of the student community. Time and time again the university's policy has been one of a tragic disrespect for students—disrespect in their lack of desire to consult with and gain the accord of the students whom their legislation is designed to effect and disrespectful in an even more concrete way, in the fact that these policies have been in contradiction to the best interests and expressed desires of students.

Little wonder that there is such bad faith in the institutions and intentions of the administration. During the U of T Act debate it seemed that even the Progressive Conservative legislature had decided that students served a valid role in determining both the orientation and specific elements of their learning process as well as the broader aspects of their university life.

However, the faculty threatened the government, massively lobbed and called out their troops to suppress what we had gained with such hard work, good faith, and recognition of both our competence, and ability.

When students became so frustrated, and given the lack of criticalness instilled by our learning institutions, it takes a great deal of frustration that a large number occupied the office of the math department chairman, the administration refused to deal with their complaints. They were pushed into this occupation, because they believed that their math education served neither their needs or desires but rather the vested interests of an oligarchy which ran the math department—an oligarchy which seemed intent on disposing of any professor who accepted the student input into the classroom situation.

Since the administration refused to deal with the problems that gave rise to the occupation, the math department went ahead with only token changes and students still had no say in determining the criteria for faculty members being hired or given tenure.

In fact, what must students' reaction be when they hear, a few months later, that the Forster report recommends no students on hiring and tenure bodies? Why is the administration so unresponsive to students? Why does it deny them even this modicum of respect which the 'liberal' university is always supposed to have upheld?

In the library issue again the university made the tragic mistake of implementing something which both excluded and deleteriously affected students. Just another incident in a long record of implementing decisions affecting students which they don't accept. If I can have any effect on the policies of this administration it would be this: to teach it that it would be in the interests of both parties for it to realize that students have an integral and vital role to play in determining the direction to their own educational process—that no legislation significantly affecting them should be implemented before they are consulted and agree with it. At least that much respect should be shown.

Once again the university seems to enact a piece of legislation against the strenuous opposition of students: eight out of eight student governors, SAC, APUS, GSU, Vic,

The Varsity—Steve Mayras

SAC Services Commissioner Seymour Kanowitch is among the throng entering the Governing Council boardroom Thursday.

New, Trinity, Hillel, medicine, nursing, etc., oppose it strenuously.

This legislation deals with how to discipline demonstrators. It denies the right of dealing with the issues involved in a demonstration or of giving heed to students' concern that the manner in which the university operates is intolerable and gives rise to these demonstrations. As long as there are these sources of problems, as long as the university structure is weighted against student interest, any attempt to discipline students is unacceptable.

For example, examine the meaning of discipline. It means punishing students for breaking the rules. As long as these rules are unacceptable to students and they have an insignificant and impotent input into how these rules are determined, any attempt to impose discipline in this intolerable situation cannot be accepted, since it only serves an undesirable status quo.

Questions of hiring, promotion, granting of tenure, and dismissal of faculty members forms the dynamics which give rise to disciplinary problems. Accepting a discipline code over students when they clearly have inferior rights would institutionalize an unjust situation. This code is asking us to discipline our fellow students for offences which arise out of conditions over which we have no control.

The faculty of the university seems to enjoy this situation where they can ignore the fact that a university should be run in the interests of students, not this situation where they can retreat to their committees where they can out-vote us. This fact, combined with the administration's basic mistake of pushing through major legislation affecting students when students are opposed to it, has produced the situation where it is only through mass actions that significant reforms can be achieved.

These demonstrations are the only threat to the ability of faculty and administration to impose their will on the university community. Therefore, the administration needed a code to legitimize its ability to suppress demonstrations by putting this ability in a legalistic context. The administration seeks to remove such actions from a political context and define them as quasi-criminal offences.

I insist that political disruptions be defined and dealt with on the basis of the political issues involved. Even Claude Bissell accepted this principle. Instead, the Code institutes a series of clauses designed to harass people who work for greater input into their university lives or protest against structures which they find alienating. The sections involving demonstrations, double jeopardy, defamation, expulsion for breaking library regulations are examples of this.

But my main point is a demand to the Governing Council to not persist in continuing this accelerating spiral of hostility. Rather, it should exhibit good faith by accepting the guiding principle of co-operative legislation and respect for all sectors of the university community—the principle that no legislation can be implemented without the consensus of those whom it is dealing with.

Prof should define 'culturally'

I've read with interest and satisfaction the recent articles of the Varsity, condemning Hector's biased attitude in regard to an injured worker. The fact that this worker had been unduly deprived of life's basic needs only because Hector's abstract theory, such as: "culturally" predisposed to play a sick role, needed a reality-grounded evidence, however malignantly applied, convinces me that prejudice always hurts the innocent and that racism finds its roots among the "elite" rather than among inhibited people. It seems a paradox that in an age, where communication and the possibility of direct human contact between different races should render impossible the stratification and preservation of racism, certain pseudo-scientists revive it by means of stereotyped aphorisms. This absolutist and unilateral way of seeing the world can be compared to that of a child who likes and dislikes people or things, more according to his instinct than to his reason. But the child's "prejudice" cannot hurt because it is innocent and not rationalized. What has to be dreaded on the contrary, is when the emotive irrationality of an adult uses prejudice as a vehicle to advance socially—or to gain "fame" by coining a maxim, such as: an Italian "culturally" predisposed to play a sick role. This kind of ethnic prejudice is pure nonsense. First, because it tends to generalize, secondly because—in the case of an injured worker a psychiatrist can heal the mind, but not a broken back. Certainly the frustration of a doctor's inability to cure a patient can be augmented by the patient's own frustration for not being cured; no wonder then the patient becomes "highly tense, anxious and rather angry". This might not have been the case with Giuseppe Pulera; but then, what has "culture" to do with broken ribs?

Whether this is racism or prejudice I can't really say, but experience has taught me that either one of them does not necessarily kill with a sword. A word can at times be more lethal than a dagger in the heart not be reticent and unwilling to come out in the open and explain that enigmatic "culturally", because as it stands now, this word can imply many things.

SDS attack is 'vicious'

It was with disgust that I read the advertisement of the Students for a Democratic Society which launched a vicious attack against Professor Hector of the Department of Psychiatry (Varsity, January 21).

Whether Dr. Hector believes in these theories or not I do not know. But whether racist theories are themselves true or false I do know can only be proved or disproved by scientific evidence and logical arguments—not by firing Dr. Hector.

The only possible justification for firing Professor Hector would be if his peers found him technically incompetent in his field of study.

The SDS needs to be reminded that this is still a free society and a man has every right to hold whatever beliefs he chooses, no matter how repugnant they may be to his fellow citizens.

If a university has any purpose it is to search for the truth and it seems self-evident that the truth, whatever it may be cannot be discovered by forbidding the discussion of unpopular or sensitive theories.

Jack O. Gibbons
Trinity College

SDS playing 'a dangerous game'

SDS is playing a dangerous game. In the January 21 issue of the Varsity, they placed an advertisement calling upon the University to dismiss Dr. Ian Hector because of his "racist" theory about Italian workmen.

The issue at stake is not whether Dr. Hector is right about Italians, and it is certainly not whether his theory is obnoxious to most Canadians. Rather, the question concerns the future of intellectual freedom at this university. Very simply, will he and other professors have the right to hold certain professional and personal opinions without having to fear intimidation by those whom they offend?

The SDS petition says, "that such theories have neither a place in the medical school nor in the university community." On the contrary, surely part of the justification for maintaining an academic institution such as the U of T is the intelligent discussion of various theories, regardless of how extreme or absurd they may sound, or how inimical they may be to the basic tenets of our society.

The attempts by SDS to have Dr. Hector dismissed remind one of the initiatives of Senator Joseph McCarthy against Harvard professors for being "un-American". Such is the nature of intellectual bigotry. If SDS wins this battle, the next step will be to purge other faculty members for their particular theories, be they racial, economic, political, religious, or social.

It ill behooves SDS to have Dr. Hector removed, for the next to go may be a leftist. For the sake of intellectual and academic freedom, Dr. Hector must remain.

More debate on South Africa

After following the mound of misinformation and ambiguity heaped upon the Varsity's "Write On" section by James P. Hull, we feel that, as tedious as it may be, it is time to finally refute his "facts" in the hope that this exercise will muzzle Mr. Hull and alleviate the need for Professor Puritt and Ms. Hurlich to waste any more time responding to his tripe.

The Sharpeville Massacres came about as a result of a call by African political leaders for a mass peaceful protest on March 21, 1960, over the government's pass laws. The pass book is a document required to be carried by every native male and female above the age of 16; people failing to produce their pass whenever asked by the police are subject to arrest and imprisonment. The 20,000 demonstrators at Sharpeville on March 21 refused to carry their passes, thus leaving the police in the position of having to arrest all 20,000 demonstrators. The police reaction to this was panic, and they appeared from inside the police station, armed with weapons. South Africa's leading English-language newspaper, described the result:

"...volley after volley of 303 bullets and sten-gun bursts tore into the crowd...as scores of people fell before the hail of bullets...Two truckloads of bodies were taken to the mortuary."

Sixty-nine blacks were killed; 257 were injured, most of them seriously. Hull's implications of snipers among the demonstrators is totally unsubstantiated. His other justification for the massacre is that the police were harassed and at least one was seriously injured. What perverse sense of values equates injury of one white policeman with 69 black lives and the injury of 257 others?

Where did Hull get the figure, "...50 per cent of the arable land in South Africa is Bantu"? Not even the South African government would support such rubbish! The 1936 relegated the majority black population to 13.7 per cent of the territory of South Africa. The Tomlinson Commission, set up by the South African government to study socio-economic development in the Bantu "homelands" created by the Act found, in 1954, that 30 per cent of all reserve land was badly eroded and a further 44 per cent was moderately eroded. The South African Institute of Race Relations, as quoted in Volume 5, Number 4 of a UN quarterly, reported that, even if properly planned, the homelands could only support about 30 per cent of their total population! Overcrowding, land mostly unsuitable for crop production, removal of the best workers from homeland areas through migratory labour patterns: all these facts stand squarely in the face of Hull's galling nonsense: "...they (the black South Africans) can't use the land efficiently..."

Let's throw away this blatant falsehood that black South Africans enjoy the highest standard of living of any blacks in Africa. There is no truth whatsoever to such a statement. Hull's figure for black per capita income is a fabrication. The YWCA's quoting figures from such sources as the World Bank, puts the figure at a little over $100 a year. It is time to clearly look at the notion that blacks are better off in South Africa than elsewhere. First of all, as pointed out by First, Steele and Gurney in such an argument is irrelevant, as poverty must be judged by the resources that are available to a country and the way in which its wealth is shared amongst the population, not according to what other countries do or don't do. According to statistics published in the UN-A 1, 1971, black South Africans earn less yearly than do blacks in over a dozen independent African states south of the Sahara. Thus even Hull's irrelevant arguments do not stand up to the mildest of scrutiny. When it is taken into account that South Africa has income in the 60's for whites was 4.5 per cent annually, whereas for blacks it was 1.6 per cent

Quoting from UN and Institute sources, South Africa spends less on education for blacks than almost any other African state (49 per cent of the national income in 1970, whereas in 1953 it was .57 per cent). The standards and facilities for blacks are much inferior. Whereas the state spends R258 on each white pupil (one rand equals $1.33 US), only R19 is spent on each black pupil. Educa-government's objectives for black education can be seen in comments from Dr. Verwoerd, Prime Minister from 1958-66:

"What is the sense of teaching the Bantu child mathematics when it cannot use it in practice?...Education must train and teach people in accordance with their opportunities in life, according to the sphere in which they live...It is therefore necessary that native education should be controlled in such a way that it should accord with the policy the government little yet would forestall malnutrition and protein deficiency. Needless to say, the government provides for no such expenditures. Ten times more black than whites suffer from TB. Child mortality rates are astounding. In the Transkei, a Bantu homeland, four out of 10 children never reach 10 years of age. These morbid statistics are not confined to the homelands. In 1969, medical authorities for Port Elizabeth estimated that 33 per cent of African babies died before they reached their first birthday. This was 15 times the mortality rate for white babies. This goes on in a country where standards of living for whites has risen to levels above those of Britain and Western Europe!

Hull throws around many statistics concerning the Bantu homelands, most of them ambiguous, many false, but all of them misleading. The homelands, in theory, provide for a system of "separate development" for Africans, using their own resources. As cited above, these reserves, on an agricultural level, can in no way support their population. The importance of the "homelands" system can be seen in the amount of money spent on them: in 1970, R73-million, or 2.8 per cent of current government expenditure (as quoted in the October 1971), as opposed to R404-million spent on security in 1969 (April 3, 1969). No industrial growth has occurred in the homelands, a development which must occur in order to provide employment for those unable to live off the land. Hull uses isolated statistics to meander around and obscure the issue of the economics of the homelands. The YWCA's deals with this issue, if one is interested in gaining a clear perspective on this system of "separate development", regardless of the bullshit spewed by Hull and his kind.

Those unacquainted with the blatant racism and use of propaganda inherent in the South African situation and more specifically in Hull's article may be, at best, slightly baffled by the conflicting viewpoints presented in past "Write On" articles. Although Puritt and Hurlich made a valid attempt at refutation of the original blasphemy, Hull, undaunted, bounced back with more unqualified Reader's Digest "facts". As most well known, statistics can be dangerously manipulated when taken out of context or out of the air. Hull appears to have done just this. Conversely, our resources have been named in hopes that the reader will delve further into the problem through perusal of the articles and books quoted. The knowledge gained would be instrumental in the elucidation of facts to create a proper perspective of the thoroughly racist situation in South Africa.

At this point, we would like to add a few words directed to the Varsity. Your printing the letters of this jackass has done a great disservice to those people who read the Varsity. It is an insult to anyone's intelligence and sense of moral commitment to the victims of apartheid to allow such a feeble-minded fool as Hull to broadcast his somewhat wanting thought processes. Hopefully this will be the end of a rather obnoxious, distorted "exchange of ideas". Puritt and Hurlich have a deep commitment to blacks suffering from oppression in South Africa. Give them a chance to express this commitment in more constructive ways than relaying the views of a racist, Nazi minority.

* Resolution passed at 1971 TUC in Blackpool SOUTHERN AFRICA

Congress strongly condemns the Government's decision to resume bilateral trade with South Africa which completely ignores that, in 1961, it expelled 196,000

Congress also deplores the Government's intention to resume trade with the Apartheid regime in Rhodesia and its continued support of it through arms, which means by maintaining and manufacturing, and believes that this represents a serious and a total disregard for the rights of the people of Southern Africa.

Congress calls on the General Council to press for the measures to strengthen trade union support to these regions, including:

- (1) An immediate call to the Government to stop the sale of arms to South Africa and to break off all commerce with the South African Government and to strengthen sanctions.
- (2) Congress calls on the Government to support for any worker who has reasons of conscience to refuse to work on arms for South Africa.
- (3) Urging all trade unions to ensure that they have no money invested in firms with South African subsidiaries.

Business Briefs

It's hard to believe there's an energy crisis when Imperial Oil Company Ltd reports an increase of profits for 1973 of $71 million.

The oil company's profits were up to $228 million at year's end compared to $157 million a year ago. Total income was not disclosed.

For U of T, it means hiring an extra truck to take the profits to the bank. Quarterly dividends are $1.76 per share, or $133.760 for U of T's holding of 76,000 shares whose market value is more than $3 million.

Without releasing the figures the company reported an increase in sales because of higher production of crude oil and higher sales of virtually all of its petroleum products.

Those spiralling retail gas and oil prices apparently had something to do with the profits for the company also attributed its profit gain to "improved" prices.

Imperial Oil is a member in good standing of the One Big Happy Family set at U of T.

The firm's chairman and chief executive officer, W. O. Twatts, sits on the Governing Council and Imperial's marketing vice-president and general manager, W. D. Archbold, is a special assistant to university president John Evans.

All together now, cry a crocodile tear for poor old Ma Bell. She only made $175 million in profit last year, before the tax man came.

With appropriate violin background, Bell Canada announced her profits were only up $10 million from the $165 million registered last year.

It was such a bad year, the old gal could only muster up $53.3 million in profits for the fourth quarter of 1973.

And pity her poor shareholders. Ma Bell could only spare a paltry $4.37 per share in the most recent dividends.

It was even worse for Ma Bell when the tax collector came around. The best she was able to do was to get an extraordinary $5.4 million reassessment raising her total profit to just over $180 million.

1974 looks like it just might be the same sob story as 1973. The hearing for the Bell Canada rate increase begins February 4 before the Canadian Transport Commission.

Ma Bell is claiming all sorts of nasty things might happen if she can't get more money, and a whole bunch of bad-guys from Ontario and Quebec are opposing the idea.

Shame-shame, all you bad guys. Can't you see Ma Bell is damn near broke?

Carpets aren't what it used to be on the Toronto Stock Exchange.

A low of $5.12 per share was reached by Harding Carpets for 1973-1974, although more recently the price has been up to $5.50.

U of T Governing Council chairman Malim Harding is also chairman and chief executive officer of Harding Carpets.

The firm supplied the broadloom for the Roberts Library in one of its more well-known deals.

The drop in share price, however, apparently is not due to a lack of university libraries being built but rather due a fear of a shortage of nylon, according to a company spokesman.

The company folks expect a shortage will not affect the business's output. In fact, the firm expects to better its profit of 70-cents-per-share when final year-end figures are in.

While the Big Three automakers are making plans to lay-off thousands of their North American employees, the companies' Argentine subsidiaries are just about ready to sign a deal for 42,000 vehicles to send to Cuba.

Under American law, the three parent firms cannot make direct deals with the Castro government.

So the automakers are in the ironic position of having to layoff American workers because of a drop in sales in the US, but gearing up for a massive three year contract in Argentina — all to keep the Commies on wheels.

DREE means rip-off money

reprinted from the chevron
By DAVID CUBBERLEY

"The central fact at the complex is that entrepreneurs walked off (legally) with $34 million of Manitoba's money in the form of "fees" and "commissions" for building . . . a complex that will never repay all its debts." So ran an article in the Financial Post describing Manitoba's largest and most disastrous attempt to overcome economic disparities within the province, the publicly-funded Churchill Forest Industries Ltd. (CFI).

Placed in receivership in 1971 by the Manitoba government of Ed Schreyer, investigators are still working to identify the real owners of the bankrupt corporation. The total cost of the complex, which is finally providing new jobs for The Pas, comes to about $115 million. Experts agree that costs for the undertaking should never have exceeded $60-70 million.

The CFI affair has corroded Manitoba's naivety about the ease and wisdom of using the public purse to charm the corporate citizen into doing the social good. It is less clear that this experience, or any number of others as disastrous, have infused any amount of caution within the federal Department of Regional Economic Expansion (DREE), also heavily involved in the initiation and funding of CFI.

Dree sprang from the loins of the Trudeau regime in 1969 and was placed under the nanynhood of Jean Marchand. Through time the infant was expected to induce a measure of economic equality throughout the nation.

Hair to a jumbled lineage, DREE is the fusion of Canada's many unco-ordinated subsidy programs, covering everything from land management to marsh reclamation, into one purportedly cohesive program. DREE was also the occasion for the creation of new and wide-ranging legislation aimed at overcoming regional "underdevelopment" through a system of public grants.

Unwilling to take a concrete stand on any of the major issues facing Canadian society during the last federal campaign, Trudeau did however focus his concern with national unity in one assertive statement:

"If the underdevelopment of the Atlantic Provinces is not corrected—not by charity or subsidies but by helping them become areas of economic growth—the unity of the country is almost as surely destroyed as it would be by the French-English confrontation."

Apart from the bitter irony of this statement in retrospect, given the "Quebec Crisis", the Liberals had and have every reason to worry. Even the favourably adjusted figures provided the public by the Liberal bureaucracy betray explosive regional disparities throughout Canada. During the winter months in Ontario, when unemployment rates of six per cent or better are a worrisome indicator of the state of Canada's imperial province, Atlantic region figures are far worse.

The effect of the winter slump is far more destructive in hinterland areas—the Maritimes settling in with 12-14 per cent unemployment overall while Quebec hovers between 8-10 per cent.

At this point in the year the mantle of confederation is particularly threadbare, yet traditionally Tory and Liberal governments have done little more than pray patiently for the summer growth cycle.

A cursory glance at regional average incomes, taken as a percentage of the national average, fails to alleviate any of disquiet—while Ontario sits happily at 116 per cent of the national average, the Atlantic region manages a barren 70 per cent and Quebec hovers around 90 per cent. Data on persons living in abject poverty only reinforces the picture, admitting to figures of 38-23-23 per cent for the Atlantic region, Quebec and the Prairies respectively.

Moreover these are, in the main, government figures—somewhat suspect and aggregated such that they do not reveal the manner in which this poverty is distributed within the regions considered or the social groups that it burdens most heavily.

Frontier and metropolis perpetuated

DREE is the federal vehicle designed to carry out the death sentence on such regional hardships. Organized to overcome the randomness of past programs, DREE is supposed to map out and implement a national plan for raising the standards of the "slow-growth" areas of Canada. That entails a formidable portion of the nation, as can be seen from the DREE map, and with recent additions spans better than 50 per cent of the Canadian populace.

Novices entering the DREE administration, having inquired as to the nature of the department, are often gleefully informed that "the business here is that of bribery—plain and simple—a new but nevertheless exact science." Marchand outlined his job as being, quite simply, "just to incite firms to go and establish in slow-growth regions where normally they wouldn't go."

The means to this end is a massive system of grants and loan guarantees, provided for by the Regional Development Incentives Act (RDIA), which make available to corporations sums of up to $12,000,000 total or $30,000 per job created by new undertakings in one of DREE's "designated areas."

sion of the Liberal understanding of economic life. Historically some urban centers developed themselves industrially far in advance of others. Industries are drawn to a core through the availability of pools of cheap labour markets. Concentrated industrial production breeds a vitality of its own through time, drawing ever more massive doses of new business.

As several centres establish their hegemony, their magnetism retards and may in fact preclude the development of other urban centres. When this process affects whole regions within the same country, when the "advantages" of some geographic groupings are geometrically greater than those of others, the free enterprise system is once again seen to require certain interventions.

Equalization of regional disparities, according to the prevailing ethic, necessitates the arbitrary development of "growth poles" in the suffering areas. However, with business looking constantly towards the maximization of profits, it tends to gravitate towards areas with developed services and to shy away from "frontier" regions.

The Liberals have it that one must "compensate" business for drawing it slightly beyond its chosen orbit—thus the use of development funds to make Halifax as serviced as Toronto and incentive grants to displace the extra costs and inconveniences of locating in the hinterland.

Don Jamieson (now in charge of DREE) and friends believe the displacement of costs through public subsidies in effect makes it possible for the capitalist to realize the same profit margin as he would have in the metropolis, thus rendering the area competitive. They also expect that once the skeleton of regional industry has been wired up, the body will become operative of its own accord.

DREE's bulging pockets are eloquent testimony to the faith placed in this belief by the Liberal government. From its creation in 1969 to August of 1972 DREE burned up more than one billion dollars in public monies.

In much the same way that mining companies and certain foreign academics are given a tax holiday during the initial stages of their Canadian operation, DREE enjoyed a vacation from criticism and public scrutiny for several years. Working hard at disbursing its funds so as to give empirical proof of its usefulness and striving to make Canadian capitalists aware of just what it has to offer, DREE laid the groundwork for its operation in a peaceful climate.

As if to warn off early birds, Marchand often publicly stressed the long term as the only valid test of the department's actions: "comprehensive regional development programs are in their infancy, in Canada and elsewhere. Some of the concepts are new and developing, others are frankly experimental." Marchand, however, reacted strongly, almost puritanically, to the small wave of criticism to first wash against the DREE edifice: "There is no reliable evidence that the regional development incentive program is ineffective."

"On the contrary, there is a great deal of evidence that the program has made a considerable contribution to employment in the slow-growth regions of Canada and it has done this in a way which represents a notable improvement over previous programs of this kind."

Despite the minister's protests, some doubt about DREE's overall planning efforts has crept into the minds of even the party faithful. T.N. Brewis, an academic whose papers are well-thumbed in departmental cadres and who looks upon regional development as a necessity, is no longer certain about the program. Brewis, who had a statistician working for two years to try to trace the method behind DREE's grant giving, concluded "they all appear to be based on whim."

Brewis' thesis is mild in comparison with the highly critical report produced by the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council (APEC). APEC is the maritime provinces' own organ for long-range industrial planning and, as such, has found itself in constant conflict with the overly-centralized and haphazard methods which characterize DREE. Still operating comfortably within the free enterprise ethic, APEC attempts to develop a comprehensive plan which will, in the long term, guarantee the Atlantic region a buoyant and reliable economy.

Atlantic region dissatisfied

Two years ago APEC outlined its disgust with DREE publicly, charging that despite its rhetoric DREE in fact favoured giving grants to regions other than the Atlantic. It chided DREE for a refusal to engage in systematic planning and for its unwillingness to work with established provincial bodies. Finally it described a DREE tactic of pushing money into "infrastructural" developments (roads, bridges, sewers, etc.), as the most publicly visible and therefore the most politically advantageous form of development.

Marchand's actions lent support to these charges, since he went so far as to apply the clamps to DREE's own maritime advisory group, the Atlantic Development Council (ADC). ADC's mistake was to attempt to set some minimal program guidelines and "targets" against which actual performance could be measured. Even these were rejected out of hand by Marchand.

APEC called Marchand's response "as inexplicable as it is disappointing" and noted that "it calls into question once again the federal government's dedication to the long-term development of the Atlantic Provinces on a planned and orderly basis and reinforces the suspicion that DREE is nothing more than a well-financed give-away program to be extended or contracted according to the economic and political exigencies of the moment."

The mass of criticism that befell DREE in 1972 took as its focal point the "give-away" aspect of the grant program and joyously charted the numerous blunders which support the argument.

Initial criticisms, raised in the House of Commons by opposition MPs, claimed that DREE was inefficiently run, that it financed firms which in fact did not need the money, that it was moving firms from one urban area to another—footing the relocation bills while throwing people out of work in core areas.

Marchand deftly dismissed the criticisms as he has so many others: outsiders can't possibly understand the method behind DREE grants because "there are a great many complex factors involved."

Marchand's ability to get away with that glib response was cancelled once the press decided to look at the issue. In a nicely timed series, which scooped the pants off the Globe, Star staff writer Walter Stewart dumped a mound of facts before the reading public; for the majority of people it was perhaps the first time they had heard of the department. Stewart picked up on the excesses of the grants and presented a number of cases like the following:

- Aerovox Canada Ltd. was provided with $235,950 to open an operation in Amherst, N.S. The grant facilitated the closure of the Hamilton operation and meant the immediate loss of 68 jobs, without so much as provision for severance pay. The new facilities will reap an additional 90 jobs for Amherst, and the company will no longer have to contend with a union and will average $1.23 per hour less in wage payments.

- Bruck Mills Ltd. was donated $843,105 for the express purpose of creating 140 new jobs in Sherbrooke and Cowansville in Quebec. In the end the operation closed out 95 of its old positions, and the federal gain was thus reduced to 45 jobs.

Enumerating these and other cases in detail, Stewart's study stirred up surface doubts but failed to get at the core of DREE programs. As usual the criticism provided was confused and confusing, a curious mixture of moral outrage at the bureaucratic excesses and individual bewilderment over the enormity of the task facing poor Marchand.

A more penetrating analysis was shortly forthcoming in the PhD thesis of David Springate of Harvard, never made entirely public to this day, but described by George Bain in the Globe. Springate investigated a sample of DREE grants and concluded that the program functioned, despite its lofty aims, to facilitate industrial free-booting: "Movement of location of plants within Canada is minimal, and significantly, grants produce few changes in respect to project timing, project size or technology used." Springate concluded that "roughly one-half of the incentive grants do not influence investment in any significant manner, and can be considered to be windfall gains."

Not surprisingly the DREEmen dismissed Springate's study in a chorus of tut-tuts such as "non-representative sample" and "too subjective an interview method." Later on, however, a leaked Treasury Board memorandum admitted that Springate's thesis gave "evidence which verifies some of the worst fears of observers of the RDIA program."

It still remains to look at the operative, as opposed to the ritual, policies which are observed inside DREE, internally the current liberal bias in favour of the "multinational" corporation, as the business world's finest product, is well reflected. Papers on the growth, proliferation and wondrous powers of the modern multinationals circulate freely throughout the DREE towers in Ottawa, lovingly collected by the scrubbed products of liberal academe harboured there. This bias is clearly represented in DREE's record, which parades a bevy of donations to companies with vast capital reserves of their own: IBM—$6 million, ITT—$13 million, Michelin Tire—$15 million, Proctor and Gamble—$15 million, to mention a few.

Thus one understands more clearly the Quebec Federation of Labour's claim that DREE is helping to perpetuate outside control of the Canadian economy and that, in effect, "the entire exercise is a pointless giveaway to foreign capitalists." Also operative is a policy which precludes giving preference in grants to Canadian capital and prevents DREE from soliciting the formation of new blocks of it to utilize departmental resources.

Despite the rhetoric about comprehensive planning, DREE's activities remain scattered and unco-ordinated. By now it is clear the department makes little or no effort to encourage the movement of interrelated industries to the same centre, businesses that by their nature would tend to solicit further industrial development. Further there is no effort to tailor the grants towards servicing the most pressing industrial needs of the country, no attempt to encourage the development of a Canadian manufacturing industry and only scant effort to assess the state of the economy as a whole. Indeed it is by no means clear that DREE does any background research—either on the firm sponsored or on the nature of the region selected.

In this respect DREE is often caught with its collective pants down. In January 1971, it donated $15 million to Proctor and Gamble Ltd. to build a mill in Grande Prairie, Alberta, to produce bleached kraft paper. One year later $13.8 million was donated to Rayonnyer Québec Inc. (ITT) to establish a pulp mill near Port Cartier, Québec. As one commentator noted:

"Because the pulp markets had been poor, even while the government was providing money to build new mills, an existing firm in Temiscamingue, Québec, was driven out of business with the result that 875 persons lost their jobs, there were layoffs in most other pulp operations."

While it would seem natural that for any major industrial development proposal some attempt would be made to assess the capacities of the market to absorb the new production, as well as to locate and assess marginal profit industries which might be jeopardized by the new competition, such common sense notions are not germane to DREE. DREE has managed to give grants to more than 14 corporations which have subsequently gone bankrupt.

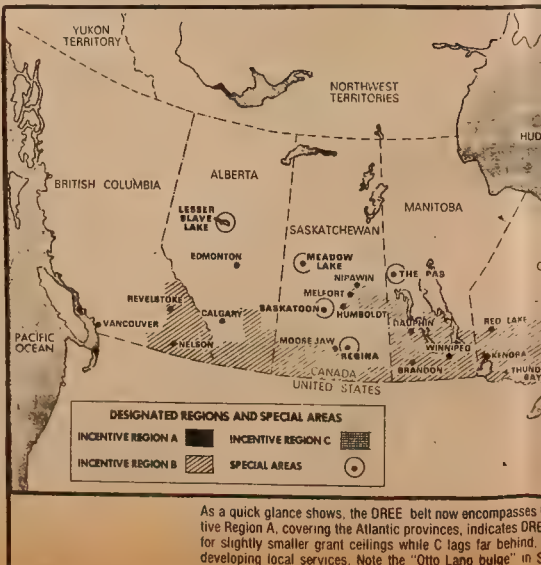

Political patronage and DREE

For awhile John Diefenbaker took to calling Marchand "the bagman" for the liberal party, implying that he has wielded his charge for direct political ends. There are, of course, the more obvious sorespots like those arising from the composition of the so-called Industrial Incentives Advisory Boards (IIAB). Of the IIAB four are connected endeavours, three of which National Sea Food Products Celanese—have received in-its humorous aspects of which is what has been dubbed "the Otto Lang bulge", the curious outcropping on the DREE map in mid-Saskatchewan which just happens to include the better part of the minister's riding.

There is a more fundamental sense in which DREE has been used as a political tool. It will be remembered that in the words of Trudeau himself the Atlantic Region was fingered as the socially and economically deprived region in the nation, and that DREE was established to take care of that. However, if one looks closely at the figures for DREE grants, calibrated on a per region basis, an interesting pattern begins to emerge. Up until December of 1970 Québec had received $34,752,000 in RDIA grants while the Maritimes received $30,913,000. From January 1971 to March 1972 Québec's total jumped to $82,637,000 while the Atlantic provinces dropped to $26,357,000 during the same period.

Robert Chodos noted in an article in the Last Post that "Québec's share has increased steadily. It got 39.3 per cent in the first six months of 1971, 53.6 per cent in the last six months of that year, and fully 74.8 per cent in the first three months of 1972." These figures clearly disclose the liberal government's attempt to consolidate its position in Québec after the faux pas of the War Measures Act in 1970.

That the preference of Québec over the Maritimes has some consistent political underpinnings is buffered by the decision of DREE to include the city of Montreal itself as a designated area. From January of 1971 to March of 1972 Québec as a whole has had 2074 applications for RDIA grants, 1,300 of which have issued from Montreal.

Jobs lost, while corporations gobble grants

While the Liberals would use incentive grants to get the "good corporate citizens" to do their bidding and to enable them to shore up a shaky political future, the corporations are doing their utmost to squeeze the government of whatever they can get.

Showing much more insight into the workings of the grant program than DREE has shown concerning the nature of the corporation, big business has found a most successful way to manipulate the strings of the public purse. Given DREE's precarious position and haphazard methods, corporations already established or thinking of establishing in an "underdeveloped" region need do little more than hint that they might move elsewhere to start the free money rolling in.

The best example of this is provided by Nova Scotia's biggest industrial plum, the huge Michelin Tire plant located in Bridgewater, N.S. The overall capital investment tallies to $150 million, and once the smoke from two years of skirmishing cleared, the public subsidy, in varying forms, totalled $88.87 million. This funding is worked out on the basis of ongoing tax concessions, provincially sponsored low-interest loans, lowered import duties and, of course, incentive grants.

DREE dumped a grant total of $15.97 million into the overall pot, the per job cost of which works out to $35,588. Michelin played the game superbly from its angle, threatening numerous times to locate elsewhere, perhaps even in the US, and used the resulting leverage to up the free monies fantastically. In a submission to the US Commissioner of Customs, made when the government threatened Michelin with exclusion from the lucrative American market, the company stated that "all these grants had little to do with its decision to build in Pictou County."

Marchand's article of faith, "I won't give you a present; I will simply compensate you for the economic disadvantages," rings hollow against the realities of incentive grants.

McCain Foods Ltd, frozen food magnate of the east, did no more than suggest it might move south to get DREE's faithful attention. That move brought the company three grants totalling $7.1 million. The sorry aspects of this instance are that the major subsidy—$6 million—was not made public at the time of granting, and only emerged in testimony given before a government committee. Interestingly enough, a high-high-ranking DREE official recently left the organization to take up a cushy post with none other than McCain's.

The grant system might be less contentious, less asinine, if it at least gained the public a measure of control over the corporations they invest in. In a case like that of Michelin, the company could comfortably afford to pack up and move its entire operation in five years, leaving the province and the public holding the bag. As David Lewis has noted:

"If Michelin fails to find markets in Canada that can sustain the employment of one thousand workers, all the investments made by the taxpayers of Canada will be worthless. The public has no equity and no guarantee about the future of any of the jobs that are created by the $600 million that their government gives away to corporations every year."

If DREE figures are accepted uncritically, under-employment in the hinterlands is clearly on its way out. DREE officially claims the provision of 58,766 new jobs as a result of efforts to bribe the entrepreneurs. Initial investigations of DREE affairs cast a different light on the matter and lead one to treat the pronouncements advisedly, as "suspect." The possibility of a proliferation of failure like that of Rayonier is firm—the official claim stands at 459 jobs gained while in reality 91 were lost.

Since these and like matters came under fire in the house, Marchand and friends scrambled to locate evidence of their good works. In this regard they found their corporate charges particularly unfaithful, numbers of them willing to speak openly with inquiring journalists about the lack of effect DREE grants had on their decisions.

A particularly good example is that of Canadian Celanese Ltd., which was granted a cool $278,629 to modernize its operations in Québec. Celanese eventually closed out one of its three plants and rationalized its operations in the remaining two—a net loss of 473 jobs through public support. Under attack, Marchand came to Celanese looking for facts to support him publicly. However, Jim Hynes, a manager for Canadian Celanese, admits that the company had little to give him at the time:

"The record is pretty poor. Marchand seemed to be quite concerned about this. He even came to us to ask us to provide him with information on new jobs so he could support the grants in parliament. We weren't able to do that, because there weren't any new jobs. We told him to take the lack that without the grants perhaps some old jobs would have been lost. He wasn't very impressed."

By this point, hopefully, neither is the Canadian public. Since 1968 federal handouts to business have catapulted by better than 35 per cent. Marry this fact with the finance department's estimate that by 1973 individual taxpayers paid nearly 50 per cent of all income tax in Canada, measure it against DREE's performance, and you have powerful reason for a good deal of discontent.

This feeling is sharpened the deeper one peeks under the surface of corporate life. Not only do we buy the corporations allegiance to the so-called social good, but we allow them virtual freedom from taxation on the profits they reap. Of the 200,000 odd corporations operating in Canada today, fully 50 per cent of them pay absolutely no taxes at all.

With this knowledge in mind the give-aways take on a bizarre reality, little more than a form of corporate conditioning designated with economists in mind. Its failing is that it relies on a "think and do" mentality on the part of the corporations, a belief that in the end they will play the part of honest Johns to society's problems and simply collect their just rewards for a job well done.

Mere belief may be the stuff on which Ottawa bureaucrats feed, but hopefully it won't suffice as a diet for the Canadian public. Perhaps, just perhaps, the time is approaching when the public will demand a more fundamental look at the entire economic structure be taken and the use of gentle correctives be abandoned.

Sasquatch crusader-Toronto

In a bid to convince the skeptics of North American society that the Sasquatch really exists, Rene Dahinden has lost his wife and $20,000 of his own money.

The embattled author visited Toronto Friday as a guest of the Fred Davis show and talked to reporters at the plush Inn on the Park.

Softening the hard-bitten journalists with tea and crumpets, Dahinden brought out his piece de resistance, two casts of Sasquatch footprints and a 100 foot film taken in 1967 allegedly of a Sasquatch crossing California swamp.

Bob Gimlin, who said he has seen a Sasquatch, was even more positive about its existence than Dahinden. "After all I saw the damn thing. Of course it exists," he said.

However Dahinden told the small group he did not say the Sasquatch existed. "There is something out there and I want to know what it is."

He launched a bitter attack on scientists saying they have refused to even investigate the phenomenon, telling him to bring in a dead Sasquatch for proof.

He charged them with being irresponsible and added the least they could do is to analyze the film.

The eight-foot-tall beasts, each weighing about 600 to 800 pounds, have been a part of the mythology of almost all the Indian tribes of North America.

Gimlin said the Sasquatch pictured in the film was a female who walked with a long stride with arms winging. He added he could not see the facial features.

A McLelland and Stewart offer of $100,000 for a living Sasquatch has received no answers, said a spokesman for the publishing company. But Dahinden and Gimlin are continuing their quest.

Any scientists who have tried to investigate the Sasquatch have been fired from their jobs, said Dahinden.

In a related development, the Ontario Sasquatch League has called for the resignation of U of T president John Evans over his suppression of a report by two untenured U of T zoology professors documenting the existence of the beast.

A spokesman blamed the move on Evans' desire to keep U of T's high reputation for research intact. "Let's face it, it wouldn't look good."

He said however, if it had been a tenured professor, U of T might have published the results.

The professors have refused to comment, fearing for their jobs.

The Students Administrative Council immediately joined the league in their demands, forming a Campus Committee to Save the Sasquatch. President Bob Anderson linked the struggle to discipline and staffing calling Evans' action "wishy-washy."

This gorgeous creature is the object of a strange search.

Student-run pubs in danger

By MIKE EDWARDS

The Hotel and Restaurant Association of Ontario is currently waging a lobbying battle against student pubs.

This is the view of Don Sanderson, speaking for the Ontario Student Pub Association at a workshop session of the Ontario Federation of Students last Saturday at Trent University.

According to Sanderson, "Students must jangle the political structures," to defend their right to have and to control on-campus watering holes.

Currently the provincial government is attempting to control the spots under the provisions of Bill 146.

Bill 146 is designed to curtail the use of Special Occasion Permits by allowing institutions like universities, hospitals, and senior citizens' homes to obtain permanent "canteen" licences.

According to Sanderson, the hotel association is lobbying to remove universities from this Bill.

Lawyer Eddie Goodman was fingered as the chief bad-guy in this lobbying campaign. Brock University was granted the first such licence in Ontario two weeks ago.

Sanderson said: "Students are responsible for one-quarter of the gross booze sale in Ontario and 50 per cent of business in licenced outlets."

He warned against sloppy student management and asked that students give serious consideration to a political lobby aimed at changing the law.

"Why not ask for a special student pub licence?" he asked.

The current laws grant licences to the university, and if students wish to control their pubs, they must now deal with it.

CIC says energy board lacks qualifications

PETERBOROUGH (CUP) According to Bob Page, energy expert of the Committee for an Independent Canada, the national energy board is dangerously ill-qualified to decide the fate of the MacKenzie pipeline project. The board will act as a court with adversary proceedings in which each side presents its case.

In a CBC broadcast two weeks ago, Professor Page discussed the unsuitability of that government body to entertain the momentous problems involved in reviewing the case.

"Currently the members of the national energy board are drawn from narrow civil service and corporate ranks, for the board was designed to handle limited technical and financing questions.

However, within a few months, it will be asked to judge the largest project in Canadian history, the MacKenzie pipeline. Included in those hearings will be fundamental questions of national economic priorities, native rights, and ecology, yet there is no one on the board with experience in these areas."

Other problems of the upcoming case include the money available to the opposing parties:

"The consortium of multi-national oil companies who are applying to build the pipeline will have spent at least $68 million on their application; the Canadian public interest groups (CIC, Pollution Probe, and the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee) who are opposing the pipeline have only a few thousand dollars at their disposal. Is this going to be a fair hearing?"

The condition that legal counsel must be made available to all involved parties appears to be an expensive. If not questionable practice, since the estimated price of legal counsel at $1500 a week will mean a total bill of $60,000 to $70,000 for the entire year of the hearings.

With its emphasis on expert data and witnesses, the court hearing the case would seem to be set up to the disadvantage of the opposition groups to the pipeline.

Labeling the board a "convenient decoy" for the Trudeau government to effectively evade responsibility for a controversial issue in a minority parliament, Page questioned whether the autonomy which the government has supposedly given the board is actually meaningful or not. With Trudeau's announcement in the house last month, confirming the government's decision to go ahead with the pipeline, and John Turner's busy work with the Wall Street barons in New York, "It will take a brave national energy board to recommend now that it not be build," said Page.

Page also expressed disgust with the NDP position on the case, since "David Lewis is prepared to go along with the arrangements to support the 'corporate welfare bums'."

CIA influx into Britain

LONDON (CUP) — According to reports in the Times and the Manchester Guardian — two of the most respected newspapers in Britain — there has been an influx of CIA agents into the country. The Times reported that between 30 and 40 agents had been drafted in Britain during the current crisis period, mainly within the trade union movement.

The reports said the agents were employed by the CIA and the National Security Agency to gather information on so-called "subversive elements" within the unions.

Reasons for the sudden influx remain unconfirmed. Miles Copeland, former CIA senior agent said in London that the CIA was convinced that present strikes by British unions were motivated by more than the want of higher wages and feared a breakdown of democracy in Britain.

Since the agents were recruited, an operation has been undertaken by the army and police at Heathrow Airport, reportedly in preparation for attacks by Arab terrorists, and this is advanced as another likely reason.

The British reports were denied by the American embassy in London in what the Times called a "general automatic" and "understandable" denial.

Meanwhile The Guardian reported that the CIA was setting up a large field office near Blackfriars Bridge in London. And they quoted one Irish labourer on the site as saying "those Americans — who else would build Fort Knox in the middle of London."

Resistance in Chile

The wave of bloody repression that swept Chile in the wake of last September's military coup is beginning to meet organized resistance.

News has been received of an important underground meeting to coordinate the struggle against the right wing regime of Augusto Pinochet

Present at the clandestine meeting were a group that included Carlos Altamirano, general secretary of the socialist party and number one on the junta's most-wanted list, Miguel Enriquez, general secretary of MIR, a united front of revolutionary groups, and the new interim secretary of the Communist Party.

The former secretary of the CP is in a junta prison and the name of the interim secretary is being withheld for security reasons.

Prior to the coup, the Chilean left had many differences. In a recent broadcast on Radio Quimantu, which describes itself as the voice of resistance and is now once again sporadically on-the-air after a silence of several months Miguel Enriquez told fellow opponents of the dictatorship

"...This is not the time to revive old differences. It is important now that workers learn the lessons of the recent Chilean experience so as to avoid new errors."

Just after the coup, informed sources believed that the socialist base in Chile was too large to be suppressed for long. The recent emergence of the resistance leadership and the renewed broadcasting of Radio Quimantu tends to confirm this

The onus is on the person nominated for election to file a bona fide nomination paper. Errors or irregularities in these papers constitute grounds for rejection of the nomination. Such errors or irregularities may be corrected prior to the close of nominations but not afterwards. The Office of the Governing Council will attempt to notify candidates of any errors prior to the close of nominations. Consequently, candidates are advised to complete and submit their nomination forms early in the nomination period.

'Bells of Hell' is offensive in a different way

Mordecai's Richler's "The Bells of Hell" was tentatively withheld from appearing on the series, "The Play's The Thing", on the basis it was offensive to the Jewish community. However, it was aired Thursday night and proved to be more offensive to the talents of Mordecai Richler and Canadian playwrights, of which the series is representative.

The play centres about the restrained life of Manny Berger, a prosperous Jewish businessman or lawyer, with conflicting interests in home purity and the elusive, sensuous gentle girl. We are first introduced to Manny on his new, bra-less secretary's first day of work. Before they leave for the day, she pops the Pill in anticipation of the night's activities in store for her on the mysterious twelfth floor.

When Manny next sees her the following morning, she boards the elevator at the twelfth floor, wearing the same clothes, to the accompaniment of Manny's jealous disbelief. In the meantime, we are introduced to Manny's wheelchair-confined, voyeuristic father, his son whom he risks in search of concealed drugs, and his intimidating, humiliating wife who steals from this wallet as he trods downstairs at four in the morning to find solace for his despair in the bottle.

Following the demise of a friend on the golf course, Manny convinces himself that all his problems stem from his failing health and so decides to confirm his diagnosis by visiting Dr. Harvey Schwartz, who was also his friend's doctor. Manny soon learns that his friend died because his donation cheques for the United Jewish Appeal had bounced and is reminded by Schwartz that he has a balance outstanding from last year and is further punished with a doubling of his former pledge and a painful rectal examination. His physical health, however, is in reasonable shape, but Schwartz believes his mind is going away.

At a poker game that evening, Manny suspects his wife also attends the twelfth floor and is certain she is cheating on him, so he fabricates a business trip to Montreal and hires a private detective to cover his wife's actions. His opportunity to visit the Yonge St. salons is finally at hand, and he attends the Venus Massage Parlour only to be captured on film by W-5 as he exits.

Further degraded to menial shopping, he is beaten once more by the evasive female who overtakes and overpowers him every moment of his agonizing ordeal. Determined to fight back, he attacks her with his shopping cart, only to be finally carted off to the sanatorium himself.

The twelfth floor represents to Manny that evil which he intrinsically craves but which his mores and conscience prohibit. But Manny is hypocritical; he knows his upbringing and society are morally decadent yet persists in confining his son, wife, and ultimately himself to those same rules. Manny suffers from a corrupt soul and chaste body and finally loses in his contest with his environment. We end with the bells of hell ringing for Manny.

The greatest fault with the play was the difficulty in associating with the characters, since not a single one had any redeeming features. Richler is a satirist who presents characters at whom we can laugh, but the laughter is really directed to ourselves. In tragedy, we cry for protagonists to whom we relate, although their respective worlds are different. In somehow combining both elements, Richler has succeeded in neither.

Women marry for money

By HEATHER SANGUINS

People who are afraid to pay housewives a wage are afraid women will marry for money, and for love. "But I think that's what they've always done," said University of New York at Stony Brook philosophy professor Sylvia Sideritch Wednesday.

The speaker suggested two alternatives to not paying women for housework are to provide daycare facilities controlled by women and to open up more creative jobs to women.

By that, she meant jobs which are not extensions of their socialized roles of temptress, mother, and housewife as are respectively, model, nurse and cook.

Sideritch decried the "illusion" of the "career woman" in society. This nation was created by capitalists because of the need for skilled labor in the work force, she said.

She pointed out "most women got out to work because they need to," and "not because they think it will liberate them."

The speaker decried the lack of information about Canada which is available in the United States. She asserted it is "out need and our task to get more in touch" with Canadians.

This problem, she indicated, was not unrelated to the lack of publicity provided by the "capitalistic press" of the U.S.

Sideritch stated the option of reform through "political activity" is not open to working women because they hold two jobs, housewife and laborer. However, "this option is open to men."

She stated: "We are not proposing for women to give up what they're doing now" and return to the hearth, but "instead be paid for housework they're doing" at the same time.

Eventually, she anticipates this payment may serve to "destroy or eliminate housework."

Women "make less money than men do," and at the same time "we're treated worse than men are."

Sideritch claimed the women's liberation movement must "not struggle only around housework but also must combine the two kinds of work, that inside and outside the home."

The result of this unified effort would be to heal the "social division" in the movement over the payment question.

Blood will get jocks higher

There may be a new drugless way of improving athletic prowess that will circumvent existing Olympic regulations.

Both Western and Communist countries are racing to develop a technique called "blood doping". It involves giving an athlete a transfusion of his own blood which gives an extra boost of oxygen to his fatigued muscles.

Under the direction of Dr. Bjorn Ekblom, Swedish researchers are conducting a series of blood doping experiments at the Stockholm Institute of Gymnastics and Sports.

It is well known that during competition, athletes' muscles need oxygen and become starved when their bodies can't supply the muscle tissue fast enough.

Ekblom removed a quart of blood from a number of athletes over a period of several days and put it in cold storage. Their bodies were momentarily weakened, having lost so many oxygen-carrying red cells, but their soon replaced the lost cells and regained normality.

The 32 days later, Ekblom refused the blood in the athletes' bodies - and noted a 25 per cent increase in endurance. Since the body passes off extraneous blood cells, the athletes' bodies returned to normal within 14 days. No adverse affects were found, although doctors said more research is needed. Naturally, many coaches have expressed interest. It could transform a mediocre athlete into a Mark Spitz and an average team into a giant killer.

At the moment, this unfair advantage could be obtained quite legally too, since existing athletic regulations do not cover new developments like blood doping.

Women swimmers finish first at Queen's

By RONA POSEN

As a result of concentrated training during early morning and evening practices, the varsity's women's swimming and diving team finished in top position this weekend at the invitational meet at Queen's.

U of T placed first with 101 points, followed by Queen's with 91 and McGill with 88.

Jane Wright, a first year language student and former Munich olympic breakstroke, captured two individual titles. She won a comfortable victory in the 100-yard backstroke with a time of 1:04.2, more than five seconds ahead of the McGill swimmer, and took the 100-yard free style in 57.6 seconds.

Swimming a smooth, easy butterfly, Wright finished second in the 200-yard free style only two seconds behind teammate Joy Stratton who won the event in 2:13.9.

Wright and Stratton joined veteran team member Marilyn McCormack and Shirley Schmidt to win the 400-yard free style relay in 4:05.4.

Stratton, Schmidt, as well as team manager Melanie Tennant and backstroke Bonnie Rimmer are graduate phys ed students at the Faculty of Education.

Schmidt placed second in the 400-yard freestyle and anchored the 400-yard medley relay squad, with backstroke Rona Posen, butterflyer Janis Williams and breakstroke Nora Dobell, to finish in third place. Dobell broke the three minute mark for the first time in her career to finish third in the 200-yard breakstroke.

Winning both one-meter and three-meter diving events was York's Kathy Lane, a former olympic competitor. U of T's Kathleen Crosbie placed second in the one meter, while Sandra Henry took second in the three-meter, followed by Ruth Allan in fourth and Ann Milburn in sixth. All four are first year divers.

Back-up team support was offered by veterans Dinny Biggs, Jan Vander Eyk, Kathy Smith and Joyce Drohan who added bulk points by finishing in the top 12 in their events. Kathy Stewart, Connie Olsheski, Rhonda McKnob, Patty Sykes and Linda Shore, all first year team members, show promise as each swam an improved time.

Coach Liz Hoffman feels that the swim team, along with breaststroke Nancy Thompson and freestyler Cathy Craft, will give Waterloo, last year's champions, and Western, a sprint for first place at the OWIAA finals being held Feb. 16-18 in Ottawa.

Men's and women's ski team win

By BEA HAMPSON

The Ontario university ski series moved to Cabotage on Saturday for the second race of the season, the RMC invitational.

The relatively new skiing location near Renfrew, Ontario boasts a vertical drop about equal to that of Collingwood. This eastern Ontario site helped balance the travel load on universities like Carleton, Queen's and RMC.

The series entered another new phase with the weekend's event dual slalom. This involves two adjacent single pole courses of equal length with parallel turns on as similar terrain as possible. With the calibre of university racers (in at least the first two seeds of men), the racers rarely finish more than a gate apart.

The course setter, however, must have been of the "old school" because the courses were such a confusing array of poles that many competitors failed to negotiate them. Only nine of 30 women and 15 of the 40 men finished.

Despite the conditions, U of T fared well, taking their second straight Molson's Trophy in two meets, to give them 20 points for the series lead.

Linda Webster, a first year student who finished eleventh in last week's race, improved to seventh. Slightly back were Ann Seymour, eighth, and Margo Hamilton, ninth.

Hamilton now has seven points in the series individual race, leading the U of T skiers. Chris Bagge finished fifth in the first run, but was disqualified on her second run while Celia Graham crashed her first run.

The men improved from last place in the first race of the series to finish second. Mike Bulger put together two goods runs for a fourth place and seven points in the series individual race, leading U of T men in the standings.

Leading him were Art Byrd of Carleton, Ian Neilson of Queen's and his brother James, also of Queen's. Jamie's eight points for third, combined with last week's eight points give him 16 points for the series lead.

Carleton, hottest team on the circuit this year and defending champions, again failed to finish enough people to place. After the first run, they had five skiers in the top ten. Paced by the Neilsons, Queen's were the winners of the Molson's Trophy on Saturday.

Doug Carter placed fifth to aid U of T to second place, despite his falling in the first run, crawling to the finish and breaking the electric timing beam with his hands.

Al Abbott was thirteenth, the only other U of T finisher, but as no one else got the required four of six starting members down twice, three was good enough for the placing. Britt Roberts was well up after the first run but fell on this second. Eastmore and Leitch were disqualified. All the universities teams are in contention fight to the last race since they can discard bad results and count their best five of the eight scheduled races toward the series championship.

The next race scheduled is the McMaster Invitational at Craiglath, but this will depend on snow conditions.

Several players of the Toronto women's hockey team defend their goalie against the Western attack. Toronto won 3-0 in a game played Friday in Varsity Arena.

Swim Blues splash McMaster 81-23

By DON WARNER

Last Thursday night the Toronto Blues swim team hosted the McMaster Marlins at the Benson Building.

Although the Mac team brought more swimmers and put on a much more respectable showing than the Queens, Ottawa and York teams the previous week, Varsity still managed to swim away with an 81-23 victory.

However, McMaster's George Stepleck, who is one of Canada's finest intercollegiate freestyle sprinters, did swim one of the best races of the night. He clocked 22.7 seconds to win the 50 yard free.

During the meet, many Varsity swimmers—Nick Rottman, Greg Vamalar, Mike Hibberd, Lance Aho, Dave Schappert, Russ Farquhar, Pin Temple, Neil Jones, John Sebben and Wilkin—came through with their best efforts of the season.

This weekend, when Alfred Tech and Michigan State visit the Benson Building, the Blues will have to swim particularly well to hold their own against these two fine American teams.

Coach Campbell expects every pool record to be broken over the weekend. Michigan State, which will be here on Sunday, is number sixth-ranked in the United States and will provide the best swimming of the weekend.

The Blues should make things very close against Alfred Tech on Friday night. It promises to be a fine weekend for competitive swimming. Events begin on Friday at 7:30 and Sunday at 2:00 in the Benson Building.

The University of Toronto basketball Blues relied on last minute heroics to down Queen's 72-63 in the Benson Building Saturday afternoon. The Blues, who lost the season opener to Ottawa but have won nine straight since, actually fought with Queen's down to the closing seconds in the game, although the final score doesn't indicate it. Toronto only lead Queen's 64-63 with 45 seconds remaining but then Queen's continual fouls allowed the Blue line to smother the victory. The Blues' point-getters were Skvington (19), Scott (11), Fox (10), Birnbaum (8), Kurzyk (7), Filinski (6), and Albo (6). Toronto had a shooting percentage of 51 as compared to Queen's 40 per cent. About 200 fans watched the game. The league leading Varsity Blues' hockey team journeyed to Kingston Saturday to play the Gaels and walked away with a 6-3 win. The Blues got goals from Kent Ruhnke (2), Doug Herridge (1), Don Pagnutti (2), and Gord Davies (1). Toronto outshot Queen's 30 to 25. Ruhnke, Pagnutti and Dave Parks were named the three stars. Betty Cook reports: in women's intercollegiate ice hockey, Toronto still enjoys an undefeated record and first place in the league. The Blues skated away with a decisive 3-0 victory over second place Western on Friday night. It was a team effort, with goals scored by Margie Goldsmith, Lorraine Sherman, and Maria Hind. Goalie Judy Reeves registered her first shutout in intercollegiate play. Next Thursday, the team travels to Guelph and will attempt to stretch their winning streak to ten games. Bitchard reports: in men's interfacuity volleyball, both divisions are involved in double elimination playoff competition. In division I, Scar advanced to the winners round by defeating Meds 15-4, 10-15 and 15-9. Eng I, who lost the first game 15-8 to Knox, but came back with 15-11 and 15-8 victories to win the match, will meet Scar in their next outing. Eng I is last year's defending Div I champ, while Scar (who moved up a division this year) is last year's defending champ of Div II. PHE took Eng II 15-5, 9-15 and 15-7, and they will meet Erin I, who stuffed Vic 1 15-4 and 15-8. In the losers round, Meds faces Knox while Eng II takes on Vic I. In the second division, the playoffs are up to the semi-final stage. New is undefeated to date, with wins over For A, St. Mike's and Grads. St. Mike's and Grads will compete for the right to challenge New for the championship. That game takes place on Monday at 8:30. St. Mike's advanced by defeating Eng III and Trin, then Pharm in the quarter finals. Grads beat Trin and Pharm.

The Conway-Paikin discipline show played to an empty house yesterday, as the internal affairs meeting to discuss the code settled nothing.

Discipline undiscussed

By ANNE HEALY

The discipline issue was not discussed at Monday's internal affairs committee meeting, although it had been handed back to this committee to be dealt with by last Thursday's Governing Council meeting.

Chairwoman Marnie Paikin summarized the events up to now and said "the code can be implemented in stages... It is still our hope that Caput will be replaced."

No amendments or deletions were presented to the committee, she said, due to the present stalemate. Proposals are to be received at the February internal affairs committee meeting.

Some suggestions have come forward, from VUSAC and from a group of law students, Conway said, without saying what they were.

William Dunphy and Professor Gary Thaler are the appointees from internal affairs to the "discussion group" as Conway called it, whose purpose it is to discuss issues and bring back recommendations.

The discipline code issue plumped into the quiet internal affairs meeting following a stormy Governing Council meeting Thursday during at which council rejected a student motion for consent before implementation of the code.

Instead council passed a motion calling for negotiations between Conway, two faculty members six students, and representatives of the internal affairs and academic affairs committees.

Any recommendations from the committee-supervised talks are to be brought to the March meeting of Governing Council, at which time, if council decides there has been "substantial progress" toward agreement, parts of the code may be implemented.

So far there has been no indication if the negotiations—which Conway insists on calling "discussions"—are to be behind closed doors or not.

Innis co-op may have to pay part of U of T house repairs

Residents of the Innis College cooperative housing project may have to pay for part of the repairs on the co-op houses that city hall has ordered U of T to make.

Repairs ordered by Toronto's housing standards department last summer have not yet been completed on five of the 10 houses slated to become part of the co-op complex.

Those five houses, 16-24 Sussex Ave., are to become the family residences in the complex.

The Innis plans for repairs on those five are not extensive, consisting mainly of upgrading the existing buildings to minimum standards plus possibly some minor renovative and landscaping work.

Those repairs would be financed by a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) mortgage which the residents must pay off, and those repairs would also include, in part, the repairs the university has not done.

The city ordered U of T to have the repairs completed by October 1, but none were done by that date. Since then minor repairs have been made, but the major repairs, such as decayed floors and some broken plaster, have not been made.

If U of T has not completed the repairs by the time the Innis co-op takes over the property for renovation purposes, the co-op's mortgage money would be used to make the repairs.

Technically if the university does not complete the repairs, the city could prosecute the university, fix the houses at university expense or order the buildings torn down.

However, this is unlikely as the housing standards department traditionally moves slowly against institutional landlords.

That slowness, in part, was one of the reasons the city department was part of the massive bureaucratic reshuffling which took place at city hall last year.

The head of housing standards resigned, the number two man was relegated to the role of consultant, and the department itself was shifted from the buildings department to the development department.

That reordering of housing standards apparently did not result in any speedup of the Sussex Avenue repairs, although the housing inspector was reportedly "hopping mad" when he saw the lack of university progress in October.

Just how much of the university repair tab the Innis residents will be picking up is unclear, although it would entail some major repairs.

Now that Governing Council has approved a lease for the houses with the co-op, the co-op must sit down with its architect to draw up final renovation and repair plans for all ten houses.

The maximum $250,000 price tag Innis principal Peter Russell puts on the work is to be spent on all 10 houses, much of the work dealing with renovation not on the city work orders.

The five student houses will have a considerable renovation job done, although those plans are yet to be made final.

The five family houses with the work orders against them will not have major renovative work done but rather repair work, according to Russell who says the families prefer to keep the houses looking like houses.

Russell says the work on the five family houses will include such things as "heating, wiring roofing and chimney work," some of which already appears on the city work orders.

Even after Innis gets the properties officially, U of T will still be officially responsible for the work orders, as the university will technically be the landlord and the co-op will be the tenants.

The housing standard bylaw requires the landlord to fix the house, regardless of who is the tenant.

U of T wants coin from Kellogg's

U of T is in the process of asking the Kellogg Foundation — the breakfast cereal folks — for $910,000 over five years to help develop "a repertoire for good university teaching."

A document before the planning and resources committee which met yesterday indicates the money, which may begin in the 1974-75 academic year, is to set up a centre to help graduate students intending to enter university teaching teach better.

In what sounds like a glorified teachers' college for PhDs, the centre would spread the word from U of T to "many dozens of campuses across Canada."

But the proposal never gets down to what is to be taught to the teachers, instead dwelling on the style of the centre rather than its content.

"The centre would encourage the development of improved methods of individualized learning and of self-paced instruction," the proposal says.

The report is peppered with jargon such as: "creative concepts," "feasibility inquiry," "aspects of media-assisted and computer-assisted instruction," and "interdisciplinary techniques."

The centre would put out a newsletter every six weeks, hold workshops and seminars, and invite speakers.

The centre would also take over an unspecified area in an unspecified building to house offices, and a small library "with reference materials in searches and explorations for ideas and projects."

The nearest thing to a curriculum in the proposal would be "the judicious use of more systematic rationales in course planning, presentation, and evaluation without becoming obsessively attached to any one modern methodological school."

Out of all that is supposed to come a group of people "developing both small and large creative concepts," although the concepts are not mentioned specifically.

One idea tossed out in the proposal, without any reference made to student course unions and their course evaluations, is to have the experts look at whether standardized course evaluation "instruments" could be developed for use at a number of universities.

No alternative accommodations guaranteed

Islanders begin receiving eviction notices

One of the many nice Island spots that Monday was served eviction notice by Metro for Tommy Thompson World.

By TOM GRAND

Metro council sent eviction notices to 70 Toronto Island residents Monday stating that their leases are terminated as of August 31.

In order to encourage the islanders to move quickly Metro council has promised a rebate on taxes and ground rent—the island land is public property—for those who move before the deadline.

In addition Metro council indicated it could not guarantee alternative housing accommodations for those islanders who stay beyond the end of August.

Wilma Bury a member of TIRA—the Toronto Island Resident Association—said this amounts to deliberate harassment under the Landlord Tenant Act since island residents have every legal right to stay till August 31st.

Furthermore she says the notices are being sent out a few at a time as part of a deliberate effort to prevent co-ordinated opposition by the islanders.

According to Bury, Metro chairman Paul Godfrey is the driving force behind the plan to remove all island residents.

"Godfrey," she says, "is a block-buster." He's trying to get as many people as possible to panic and move off ahead of time, she said.

None of the islanders have signed the eviction notices she says.

Toronto Life's latest issue carries a survey indicating that the majority of people in both Metro Toronto—62 per cent—and the city—63 per cent—are opposed to Metro's decision to force the island residents to leave.

When Godfrey was asked how he could continue to support Metro's decision in light of the survey, Bury claims his answer was show me a poll were 80 per cent are in favor of the island community and he might favour it.

In response to the pressure from Metro-Council, TIRA met Monday and decided to set up its own housing task force to investigate how to go about finding suitable housing for island residents should they eventually be forced to leave.

At the present time island residents have no intention of moving but since Metro council has indicated it may not be able to guarantee alternative housing after August, TIRA has decided to look into the matter itself.

Basically the question seems to be if Metro council can find alternative housing now why can't it find the facilities after August, Bury asked.

The answer, according to Bury, is that Metro is trying to scare the islanders into moving as quickly as possible.

The ironic thing about it, she says, is Metro council does not have enough money in this year's budget to tear down the houses for future developments, so why the rush?

In 1956 Metro Toronto assumed control of the city owned portions of the Toronto Islands for Park purposes.

The decision to develop the islands for park purposes has led to the progressive demolition of Island houses till only two groups of houses remain: one group of 105 on Algonquin Island and a second group of 149 on Wards Island.

Metro originally had set the date for removal of the houses for 1968 but it has granted annual stays of execution since then.

Within the past year Toronto city council has voted to allow the islanders to remain but Metro council did not in December.

As a result of Metro's decision the islanders are faced with two alternatives, to fight the decision in the courts and/or to seek a change in the political arena, Bury said.

... and the other sort of dwellings on Ward's Island, the sort of places the Star refers to as "a shanty town."

Subways delayed by reports

By MARILYN EMERSON

Decisions on the future of Toronto's downtown transportation system are being stalled by studies which could ultimately determine the nature of transportation in the core area.

In February, 1973, the Toronto Transit Commission submitted a conceptual plan to city council for a Queen Street subway which was approved in principle, but that idea has a long road to follow before any subway is built.

Nine months later the city public works committee requested the central area division of the city planning board to undertake a study of land use, density and development potential in the central city area.

Recommendations were to be made if the studies indicated a rapid transit facility would be beneficial in the downtown area.

Prior to the committee's request, the Borough of North York requested the proposed Eglinton subway receive priority in construction ahead of the Queen Street subway.

The Metro transportation committee then requested a study of comparison of passenger volumes on Queen Street and Eglinton Avenue which revealed passenger flow along Queen Street to be larger than along Eglinton.

While the TTC continues to hold that a Queen subway line be given priority over an Eglinton rapid transit line, action on the issue is being held in abeyance pending results from the requested reports.

John Parkinson, a conceptual planner for the Metropolitan Toronto Transportation Plan Review stated a Report to review proposed additions to Toronto's subway system is under way.

He said "it reviews what's happened to date" and will be a "summary of the status of all proposed subway lines."

The study being undertaken at the request of the public works committee considers the urban environmental influences of a Queen line.

Ron Soskolne, a principal planner for the city planning board said the main objective of this study is "the land use impact" of the proposed Queen subway line.

He said "the study could influence the form and location of the next subway line." The study is expected to be completed by the middle of this year.

George Wheeler of the urban team of Pollution Probe, who favors work opportunities being situated close to residential areas, is happy about the committee's recommendation for the above study.

He said "the recommendation is in line with the new holding by-law" nevertheless "any transit line economically benefits someone."

Set up by city council, the Core Area Task Force was established a year ago to look at movement in the core area.

A spokeswoman for the task force said the force's recommendations will hopefully be submitted by the end of February.

She said although the present recommendations may not influence the presently proposed Queen subway line, the work of the task force will ultimately effect transportation in the downtown area.

The studies of the South East Spadina Planning Office (SESP) of the city planning board concentrate on residential areas and have been going on for two years.

Nearing completion of Part II of their downtown study, representatives of SEPO will submit a report with recommendations to city council by May or June.

The combined findings of the extensive studies could restructure downtown Toronto, thus foiling TTC's belief in the Queen Subway as the next best line for Toronto—after the Spadina subway.

Discipline campaign continues

The campaign against the code of behavior continues! The Committee to Repeal the Discipline Code meets Thursday at 4 pm in the North Dining Room, Hart House. The meeting will discuss tactics for continuing the struggle and involving more students in the work. Especially welcome are people who haven't been closely involved in the campaign but want the code repealed.

The university has given up the idea of putting their official day-care centre here. Could be because it's presently occupied.

U of T daycare gets new location

By ANNY HEALY

The official U of T daycare centre has found a new location—the two carriage houses behind the Drill Hall on St. George Street.

The daycare centre was to be set up in the meteorological building on Devonshire Place, but it would have taken almost a year before U of T could move its centre in. The centre now is to open in the fall.

The estimated cost of renovation of the carriage houses is $108,000, but parent-controlled centres are eligible for grants of up to 80 per cent of the renovation cost.

Jill Conway, internal affairs vice-president, says she has "good reason to believe the government will act kindly" towards the U of T centre because of the possibility of study, in a university community, of such an on-going centre.

The daycare centre will also operate a child-minding service in the evenings to accommodate evening students.

Appointments to the proposed seven-man board of directors are now being considered. To this board of directors are to be appointed four parents and three nominees of the university.

Canadian unions will lead struggle

Dr. Charles Lipton is the author of the book, The Trade Union Movement of Canada, 1827-1959. He is a professor at Sir George Williams University in Montreal, teaching a course in labour relations.

He was an organizer with the United Textile Workers of America (AFL-CIO) in the 1950's and was involved in many struggles with the workers in the textile plants in and around Montreal. He worked with Madeleine Parent and Kent Rowley from 1955 he was at the founding meeting of the Confederation of Canadian Unions.

From all this experience and work with people in the textile plants and UTWA, he began work on this book. Since 1955 he has spent most of his time preparing and promoting The Trade Union Movement of Canada, 1827-1959.

This book is the most important work of its kind in print today. It spans some 130 years of labour history. A story little told in Canadian history, it begins with the development of industry and the rise of capitalism and tells how in this period workers were already beginning to organize and fight together.

He describes the Winnipeg General Strike 1919, its successes and failures. How the workers for the first time united together for better working conditions and wages. He explains the impact the strike had all across the country and how it demonstrated to the workers that mass organization and unity wins them better working conditions.

The book ties in the role of the Communist Party during the depression; the On-to-Ottawa Trek, The One Big Union Movement and finally the Workers Union League: how the Communist Party set about to destroy the OBU and the WUL. They invited the CIO to come up and organize workers when these same workers were already organizing themselves and building unions across the country.

Dr. Lipton explains in the book how the CP began its slogan of "Canadian Autonomy" instead of independent Canadian unions. He describes the strikes of Lachute and Asbestos (1947, 1949) with vigor and strength. He shows the real reign of terror that Duplessis created in the late 1940's and 1950's and describes how Madeleine Parent and Kent Rowley fought for the workers' rights and got them better working conditions and wages.

All these struggles in our labour history have paved the way for the new struggles which are taking place today in the fight for our own independent Canadian unions. Struggles such as Kilmat, where the workers broke away from the United Steel Workers of America to form the Canadian Aluminum, Smelter and Allied Workers, the fight at Cominco in Trail to get the Canadian Workers Union certified.

New unions are forming every year because workers are getting fed up with the international unions and are breaking away. These unions are joining the Confederation of Canadian Unions, the national centre for independent Canadian unions which was formed in 1969 because they saw the need for joining together to fight against US imperialism.

The new postscript in the book is a rousing call to all Canadian workers and their supporters to rise up and fight to form independent Canadian unions and to pave the way for the liberation of Canada from US imperialism.

The workers have always been in the forefront of the struggle in Canada and will lead the way for the final struggle.

PhD job prospects overestimated

The Canadian Association of Graduate Schools in its latest annual report is again optimistic as to employment prospects for new PhDs, in an attempt to obtain adequate government funding for member schools. Its credibility would have been enhanced by appealing to raison d'état (national interest and national pride), as the Ontario Select Committee on Economic and Cultural Nationalism in its interim report has done. However, Canadian academic administrators tend to shun patriotism. On the other hand, it is true that governments have been trying to discourage graduate enrolments, in part due to the fear of producing a potentially subversive group of redundant and alienated intellectuals. Dr. Max Von Zur-Muehlen, in his report titled "The PhD Dilemma in Canada: A Case Study," in Canadian Higher Education in the Seventies, edited by Sylvia Ostey, Economic Council of Canada, 1972, had predicted (late in 1971 and not five years ago, as stated in the Varsity) as many as 7,000 unemployed PhDs by 1977.

Let us assume that the data collected by the CAGS from member graduate schools are entirely correct. The report shows that on average only 35 per cent of new PhDs have been finding university jobs in Canada and abroad in 1972-73 (as opposed to 48 per cent prior to 1969). Of those who submitted their theses in 1972-73 about 4 per cent are unemployed (the rate being eight per cent in the humanities); 10 per cent are gaining employment in government and industry each; and six per cent work in private research institutes. Very few teach in high schools. Secondary schools and community colleges tend to shun PhDs. (Moreover, in the former especially enrolment is dropping, too; teaching certificates are needed to obtain permanent posts.) Only three per cent of new PhDs teach in community colleges, whereas 28 per cent are engaged in post-doctoral work. Both are types of underemployment. According to the Economic Council of Canada study mentioned above, in recent years post-doctoral research usually was undertaken as an alternative to unemployment. Around six per cent of new PhDs are unaccounted for and classified as "Other." (This category includes high school teaching.) Thus it seems that around 35 per cent are underemployed, assuming that those who found employment in government, industry and private research are in suitable non-teaching jobs. We are told that "the vast majority are doing worthwhile things." However, underemployment may well be more demoralizing than downright unemployment.

In the humanities and social sciences there are fewer graduates than in the physical and applied science fields. In each of these broad areas the unemployed and underemployed combined amount to about 20 per cent. An academic vacancy results in as many as 300-1,500 applications. The unsuccessful candidate learns of rejection from a callous form letter! With 757 theses in progress in history alone, there are seldom as many as 10 history posts being advertised in any one issue of University Affairs, the monthly register of Canadian universities.

It is highly unlikely that new opening in government and private research could offset the scarcity of academic jobs in Canada (even during boom times), bearing in mind the now notorious non-preferential treatment usually accorded to Canadians in their own universities and the "branch plant" nature of our economy. A Canadian PhD graduate may well find that it takes him (or her) up to three years to obtain suitable employment. Since post-doctoral fellowships are limited in number, and many jobs PhDs are compelled to avail themselves of them two or three years in succession, eventually they might cease to be a means of alleviating unemployment among new graduates, especially in the physical sciences. There are bound to be some backlogs of unemployed and underemployed PhDs and the numbers of graduates are increasing, as the annual CAGS studies show. Some new faculty lost their jobs, due to the budgetary cuts of 1972-73. Finally, expatriate Canadians complain of having to stay in "an unwilling exile."

While smaller institutions supply fairly accurate data on the numbers of their job-seeking PhDs, this is not likely to be true of big bureaucracies like the University of Toronto, which produces 21 per cent of all PhD graduates across Canada. Marjaaleena Repo's report of 1970 points to greater numbers of contemporary job seekers than does the parallel survey done by the University of Toronto School of Graduate Studies. In selected disciplines in the humanities, the discrepancies ranged from 40 per cent to 250 per cent! The situation was similar in the physical sciences. Post-doctoral students tend to exist in a "no-man's land," even though they also are seeking jobs. There is no evidence to suggest that the SGS data are now more accurate than they were in 1970. And contrary to the report in the Varsity, Repo's survey is not dated. Graduate taxi divers are still with us. The incompleteness of the SGS data no doubt affects the credibility of the CAGS report. In terms of all pertinent factors, the optimism of the CAGS is unwarranted.

Review Vic Act soon: VUSAC

Thursday, January 17, the Victoria College Board of Regents passed a motion calling for 10 of its 22 church seats to be opened to students and faculty. Students will get four of the 10 seats, the faculty six if the motion is approved by the General Council of the United Church, now scheduled to meet August 18-22 of this year.

VUSAC requested eight Board seats for students according to its interpretation of parity, i.e. equal representation for five Vic constituencies: administration, faculty, students, alumni, and church, among the 43 Board seats. Despite its considerable influence on Vic affairs through the Victoria and Emmanuel College Councils and the Senate, the faculty stands to gain six seats on the Board, the students four, and it was the students, not the faculty, who actively campaigned for sizeable representation on the Board.

Such would be unprecedented if it were not typical. The Board's Executive Committee considered VUSAC's brief on student representation on November 21. No minutes of the meeting were kept; at least, they have never been distributed, despite a request by students who attended the meeting that they and the Board's secretary prepare jointly a set of minutes. The only official document regarding the Executive Committee's proceedings that evening is a report prepared by President French. Upon reading it, the student observers at the Executive Committee made their request for a set of minutes written co-operatively, because there were several discrepancies between the notes the three of them took independently and the report prepared by President French.

In reading his report to the Board at its November meeting, President French said the Executive Committee had passed a two-part motion:

- that the Victoria University Act be reviewed by 1976
- and that the Board recommend to the next General Council of the United Church that 10 of its seats on the Board be opened to faculty (six) and students (four), which two-part motion the Board dutifully ratified at its January meeting.

According to the notes of the student observers, the motion had four parts. Besides (a) and (b) above, it stated (c) that the discussion of parity be tabled and (d) that a lawyer having no connection with Vic review the Vic Act. President French mentioned the Executive had agreed that the Vic Act should be reviewed by a lawyer independent of Vic; he did not present this to the Board as a motion, however, but included it in the body of his report. He made no mention of parity.

The Board did not officially adopt President French's report, although the secretary of the Board read it into the minutes of the November Board meeting. The Board did not affirm the motion to look for a lawyer; nevertheless, President French began to make arrangements for one. The Board as a whole was informed, not consulted.

VUSAC welcomes the Executive Committee's decision to review the Vic Act, but wishes this motion had the recognised support of the Board as a whole. Further, VUSAC suggests an earlier date than 1976 for reviewing the Act. With regard to the whole issue of statutory review, VUSAC points out that the U of T has established a committee to review the U of T Act (1971) and that this committee is to report to Governing Council in April. So, it seems, this spring would be the most appropriate time to review the Vic Act (1951), since there are sections of the Careful reconsideration of events that transpired at the General Council Meeting on January 17 has led me to the conclusion that submitting my resignation was the correct decision. I believe that it is in the best interest of the GSU at this time.

It was very pleasing for me to note that the General Council refused to accept my resignation but, unfortunately, this will have no effect on my decision. My resignation will become effective when a successor is found within the next three weeks.

At present, the GSU operates as a social club for graduate students. For various reasons I have been thwarted in my efforts to engage the GSU in activities that would substantially better the lot of all graduate students.

Successes within the last eight months include the initiation of an organ, the Grad Post, to increase graduate students' awareness of issues that affect them. We were also successful, to a limited extent, in gaining $800,000 of increased funding for graduate students from the Budget Committee of the Governing Council. But it must be admitted that this figure is far from adequate. We could have been much more effective in lobbying at all levels of government, however, if we had had more support from graduate students. I had attributed this lack of support to the fact that graduate students carry a very heavy workload and would prefer to see this work done by someone else. This, I could have understood.

The GSU represents half the graduate students in Ontario and a quarter of the graduate students in Canada. Not only do we have the great potential to be a political force but also the moral obligation to become one. It is for this reason that I am saddened by the sudden realization of the real reason for a lack of support by graduate students.

I can only assure the membership of the GSU that this type of work does indeed require a lot of effort. My experience in this regard is not atypical. Any other student leader could tell you of the enormous number of hours required in order to do a good job.

I hope that my resignation will help in pointing the GSU away from the direction in which it is currently headed. Although I do not expect that the next president will be appreciated much more for the time he devotes to the position, I certainly hope that he will not be faced with the obstructionism which I have confronted.

Cliff Watson
GSU president

Coming of Jesus may save us from Blue Machine

Sometimes I get really depressed - you know, about the state of the world and all. The weekend of January 26 was a real bummer.

First, the Pickering Airport. The Big Blue Machine has decided to go ahead with it. This is because expanding Malton would make noise levels unbearable for the 119,000 residents living in its environs. With devastating logic, however, the Machine has also okayed the building of Cedarwood City, with a projected population of 150,000 near the new airport. And the new Metro zoo lies 10 meagre miles west of the airport site. Cedarwood will go plip in the middle of the green belt nearest to the eastern boundary of Metro and the airport splot in the middle of several bird migration routes.

Then there's Highway 407, a new suped-up model of the present Highway 7. It will be the major go-between for Malton and Pickering airports. Which brings us to the Scarborough expressway. This will obliterate homes and divide communities from the Gardiner to West Hill. Actually, the proposed extension of Highway 400, paralleling the abandoned Spadina expressway's route, is a worse horror show. For all the dollars and grief involved in pushing these roads through, we could have one heck of a public transport system.

And we hear that John Yaremko, an honest man, stuffed ballot boxes during the last provincial election.

Oh, yeah, and to get into the open meetings of the Board of Inquiry which held sessions demanded by the public to re-evaluate the Pickering airport, you had to be professionally qualified as an engineer or something, or have a "new" idea.

The government of Ontario apparently does not consider a consensus among the people a prerequisite for action. In this way, it is much like the U of T government which threatens to impose a Code of Behaviour on the students without their consensus. I hope Jesus is coming soon.

Article on Evans work paper was imbalanced

I should like to comment on two aspects of the story, "Colleges win concessions, Evans work paper scrapped" (Varsity, Wednesday, January 16). Apart from the fact that I don't believe President Evans has conceded very much, it is the imbalance of the article and a mild case of misquotation which concern me.

Your reporter makes the meeting of the Trinity College Council sound more negative than it really was. There was considerable support for the idea of university departments, and virtually all present were in favour of continuing discussions with the university. A motion to that effect passed with one dissenting vote.

I am quoted as using the word "dictatorship". That is incorrect; I did, however, describe the structure of university departments, as set out in the Haist Rules, as "authoritarian," and I stand by that word. A chairman is expected to seek advice from a "committee of senior" persons in his department and from meetings of the department as a whole. His decisions, however, are his own. No senior committee and no departmental meeting can veto them.

Now it is quite true, as several speakers pointed out at the council meeting, that most university departments are, in practice, run quite democratically. But where this is so, it is because the chairman in his wisdom permits it, not because the Haist Rules require it.

In contrast, the departmental structures of most of the college-subject departments are much more democratic. In the combined department of German, for instance, those matters under its jurisdiction are decided by a majority vote of a departmental meeting (29 faculty, seven teaching assistants, 14 student representatives). No chairman can veto the results. It is because of this freer tradition that some of us are a bit nervous at the thought of being put into an authoritarian structure, no matter how "enlightened" the chairman may turn out to be. For this reason—and this is what I tried to express at the council meeting—it is our hope that along with the new university department structure will come a number of safeguards, even if it should be necessary to modify the Haist Rules.

This will be an important point in the continuing discussions between the federated colleges and the university.

Secret files used to incriminate innocents

The Commission on Police Reform (COPR), an independent non-governmental body, was formed in 1973 to examine impartially and offer recourse to those people affected by police control.

COPR members include several Canadian lawyers and businessmen who contend modern policing techniques involving computerized communication systems and secret dossiers are creating a police state environment where false charges, illegal searches and detentions and harassment are a way of life for a substantial portion of the Canadian public.

The basic issue at hand is whether or not police are permitted to invent dossiers against individuals or groups and circulate them among police agencies and judges so the human rights of the person or group are covertly destroyed.

A case in point follows:
Recently, in an attempt to sway a judge's opinion against a person awaiting sentence, RCMP officers presented an unexpurgated file which involved matters other than the charge being tried, including records of withdrawn and dismissed charges. Judge Edward Wren objected angrily and called the practice of submitting such dossiers "absolutely appalling." He suggested crown attorneys across the country apply strong pressure to have this practice changed.

This police practice, of collecting and using false reports on individuals, is not restricted to the courts. Often police leaks to the media have resulted in the blackening of an individual's reputation, sometimes almost beyond repair. A mayor in North York who was accused by police in the press of staging his own wife's kidnapping for publicity purposes, is a good example.

In essence we are dealing with a violation of the common law principal that an individual is innocent until proven guilty, and must be faced by his accusers with their charges made known to him. A recent strike at Artistic Woodwork in North Toronto strikingly brought this fact home.

Police Inspector Jim Morgan told the press the strike was a "political plot of a number of aldermen and a confrontation scene for Communists and radicals."

The union's reasons for the strike were much different than those given by the police, and several charges were laid against strikers by the police. On the other hand some people charged the police, including an alderman who brought charges against police for assault.

Although the cases have not been tried in court, the people involved have already been in the press by Inspector Morgan through a not uncommon police practice of media manipulation.

The hidden files of Canadian police

The combined forces of Canada's police number some 60,000 individuals. Crime rates are always rising and police seem ever more unable to cope with it. Harold Adamson, chief of the Toronto police force, has asked citizens for assistance to "become more vigilant, each of us" in stopping crime. Yet the true cause of this increase in policework has never been discovered nor eradicated.

The police's manufacture of false reports and dossiers on individuals can create a climate of social unrest in which crime operates and is encouraged. The extremist notion of reporting your fellow to the police for some real or imagined misdeed of his, only adds to an environment of suspicion and civil commotion. As is always the case in this type of operation, the informant is anonymous and the person being informed on has no recourse to correct any false reports. There is no wonder that people are afraid of the police.

Surveys undertaken by the COPR have indicated a strong dislike on the part of the populace for the practice of including innocent in police dossiers. Of a cross-section of professionals, businessmen, and laymen and students surveyed, over 70 per cent wanted any files destroyed on people found innocent after police investigation.

However, there is also a prevalent attitude that "police are fine as long as I don't have anything to do with them." So nothing concrete gets accomplished.

Canadian crime statistics are notoriously inaccurate and as there is no independent government system for verifying the truth or falsity of figures submitted by police, it is difficult to find out how efficient our police forces really are. However, statistics for 1970 do point out several issues:

In 1970, of 1,574,145 actual offenses reported or known to police across Canada, approximately 52.8 per cent were proven unfounded. Only 571,969 people were charged with offenses: the majority of persons (45 per cent) were charged under the Criminal Code and 40.8 per cent under provincial statutes. The remainder were charged under municipal and federal statutes. This indicates that a considerable number of people were investigated and found innocent without their knowledge.

Of the 571,969 people charged with crimes in 1970 approximately 150,000 were charged with indictable offenses. Of these, only 45,880 were convicted.

There are reasonable grounds to suspect that a number of the charges laid by police were either false or unnecessary. Judge David Vanek of Ontario recently stated that often a citizen is put in the position where he feels the Crown is pushing him into a guilty plea because of duplicative charges laid. He said it's all means of exerting undue pressure on the citizen to plead guilty on one charge under the threat by police of being arraigned on one or more serious charges.

Once a person has been charged by the police it is a matter of record and the information is automatically stored in police files and computer banks regardless of the outcome in court.

Former RCMP corporal of 14 years, Jack Ramsay, told the public in 1972 he could cite cases "chapter and verse" where mounties had perjured themselves. He blamed the "mindless militarism in the force", for causing fear or oppressive disciplinary actions among RCMP officers and stated that fear of discipline has lead officers to write reports paying more attention to the numerous RCMP rules than to the facts of a case.

Currently, information in police dossiers can be distributed rapidly from any local agency through the RCMP federal computer banks and the Interpol radio network to any single police officer in the free world. While this system has definite advantages as an aid in police law enforcement activities, there can be serious repercussions if the system is abused at any level. Allan Coulin, director of computer systems planning for the Ontario Police Commission was quoted as saying:

"The judgement of the police officer is still the most important factor. Though he now gets more information, he should be that much more careful of how he handles it."

The RCMP computers as of June 1973 contained information including names of hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions of Canadians charged with offences anytime in the last 63 years, whether they were found guilty or innocent. The names along with charges and convictions for virtually every crime for which a person can go to prison, will be on almost instant call through the computer, one of the most sophisticated in the world, to every police force in Canada. In actual fact any policeman can request information from the Ottawa IBM 360-65 computer and receive an answer within 10 to 15 seconds.

It has been reported that information on people merely suspected of crimes was also being fed into the RCMP computer by individual policemen throughout Canada.

In 1970 alone well over one and one-half million cases of criminal offences were investigated by police. Only 571,969 people were tried. Are the names of innocent individuals investigated for crimes they didn't do being placed into the computer? If so this could have serious ramifications for Canadian society.

In spite of the increased speed of police information, retrieval and dissemination, police chiefs across Canada are opposed to the idea of informing the innocent of their innocence. Metro Toronto police chief Harold Adamson, among other law enforcers, presented strong opposition to a Senate committee on the recently passed wiretap bill. Adamson opposed the amendment stating that people found to be innocent during electronic surveillance by police must be informed of their innocence within 90 days after the investigation is concluded.

The amendment was passed by the Senate despite police opposition. The fact is that a dossier collected on the person proven innocent would still remain in police files and possibly in RCMP computer banks and these dossiers can contain inaccurate or false information.

Interpol—an international 'spy' network?

However great the imbalance between police powers and individual civil liberties might be, police are still subject to legislative controls at national and provincial levels. This is not the case with the International Criminal Police Association called Interpol.

Interpol is under no governmental controls anywhere.

Interpol was founded in 1923, in Vienna. At the outbreak of the war, it was taken over by the Nazi spokesmen, Heydrich, and its files removed to Berlin. They are supposed to have been lost in the fall of Berlin in 1945.

After the war, Interpol was started again, and established its headquarters (called the International Bureau) in Paris, where it remains to this day. The most permanent feature of the International Bureau is the Secretary-General, M. Nepote, who has been there since 1945. It employs more than 100 people.

Any country can be a member of Interpol, provided the other member countries agree and there are now 103 member countries.

In each member country there is an Interpol office, which is called a National Central Bureau. It is nearly always situated in the headquarters of the national police force and acts as a liaison between that police force and all other police forces which are members of Interpol. For example, Interpol-London is situated in New Scotland Yard. Interpol-Germany is situated in Wiesbaden at the Federal Criminal Police Office. In Canada the Interpol Office is located in the RCMP federal headquarters in Ottawa and manned by RCMP staff. However, in the US the National Central Bureau for Interpol is situated in the US Treasury Department and not in the FBI. No Iron Curtain country is a member of Interpol; Russia and all her satellites withdrew several years ago.

Thus Interpol consists of an International Bureau and over 100 National Central Bureaux. However the National Central Bureaux are paid for by the governments concerned and are manned by local policemen.

Interpol has its own radio network.

The International Bureau has great power because of its extensive communication lines. It is subject to no government. It has constituted itself as a sovereign state of the police. It has excellent public relations created by itself for itself.

Most police forces are very much less efficient than they pretend. Interpol is no exception.

By article 3 of its Charter, Interpol is forbidden to interfere in political, military, racial or religious matters.

Interpol is not a government organization, as such. It was not set up by treaty. It is a private organization to which countries can belong.

There are no available publications giving statistics on Interpol activities. Because of its unique position, Interpol reports circulated on an international basis can, if false, create international incidents the truth of which could not be determined without great cost and much time consumed by governments involved.

Recently, a federal MP (name withheld by request) told COPR members that four foreign nationals attempting to immigrate to Canada from Algeria were refused entry by immigration officials on the basis of an Interpol report stating the persons were political agitators, and were of no use to national police agencies. The rising numbers of young Americans serving up to life sentences for minor offences. The fact forces use Interpol to shoot nationals overseas.

Citizen complaints of police met with such opposition that many people plead guilty to a false charge to get the time and money fighting back, creating public outcry against the police.

The complainant has asked for an apology but has received no satisfaction. The statement was taken from the man while he was in Toronto hospital after suffering a heart attack on the day following the police incident.

A follow-up complaint to the police commission yielded no satisfaction.

Most abuses of police power depend entirely on the viewpoint or mood of the officer involved. Police state activities from detaining people on the street for a computer check, to physical violence by police when a person refuses to answer questions, are commonplace.

Legally, a person has no obligation to answer any police questions unless he is charged with an offence and even then he has a right to have a lawyer present. The case of Levitz vs. Ryan, an RCMP officer, outlines a common RCMP practice of denying persons being searched the opportunity to call their lawyer—a practice contrary to the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Redress against police abuse may be obtained through the courts or by appealing to the complaints bureau of police agencies. As records of complaints against police were not available from the police commissioners, it is impossible to tell how many complainants received satisfaction.

The position of a complainant against the police is at least difficult if not untenable in the face of police powers.

It is not inconceivable that bias, opinions and reactions that a police officer would glean from any one of the above situations would be written up in police dossiers on the person. The question is, how will other police officers react when receiving that information now on file in a dossier or computer bank?

False or inaccurate information recorded in a police file could easily account for further abuse by other police officers acting on what they assume to be correct data.

Opinion and sometimes outright falsehoods can be circulated through the current police communications system and thereby create adverse situations to the detriment of the person investigated and, therefore, the entire system.

Recommendations

The foregoing information, as evidenced by the magnitude of the number of investigations, while not proving of itself a misuse or abuse of the information contained by the police to the detriment of Canadian society, does indicate potential abuse on a wide scale.

It would appear that the thrust behind the recent amendments to the Criminal Code were not based on actual numbers of abuses by the police of wiretapping, or the flagrant misuses of the data collected to the detriment of the person tapped, but rather the amendment would seem to be based on the right to privacy principle and the protection of human rights in its broadest sense. It is an attempt to eliminate in the early stages the misuse of information gleaned by these means without the knowledge of the person investigated.

The thrust behind this proposed legislation springs from the above premises.

Should records and dossiers be retained on persons who have been investigated? And there is no attempt here to inhibit unreasonably the police duty to operate in a democratic society.

The Criminal Code could be amended as follows:

- To allow the attorney-general of each province and the solicitor-general of Canada, as the case may be, to create a Criminal Records Committee made up of the following:
 - The committee should be composed of one judge who shall be the chairman, two nominees from each of the opposition parties and four laymen and four lawyers.
 - All proceedings and decisions of the committee shall be held in camera.
 - Each member of the committee shall be appointed for a term of one year and at the end of that term shall not be eligible for re-appointment.
 - The members of the committee shall be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.
- That all police forces will carry out their investigation as presently conducted, but will be required, within six months of initiating the investigation, to ask for authorization of the Committee to extend the period for a determined reasonable time.
- If the investigation does not warrant a charge to be laid, then all of the information collected from all sources, together with a listing of all parties receiving information, the latter to be supported by any data in the possession of the parties receiving the information which is to be collected by the Investigatory agency, shall be forwarded to the committee. If the investigation does not warrant a charge to be laid, then all the information accumulated from all sources and all information published to all recipients shall be forwarded to the committee.

- The committee must notify the person within 30 days that he has been investigated and that the file will be destroyed within 30 days from the date of the notice.
- The notice will state that the person investigated may review the file within that period of time.
- If the person wishes to make any representation regarding the data contained in the file, he may do so before the committee.
- If the person is charged with an offence to which he was investigated and found not guilty, the same procedure applies.
- If the person is found guilty of an offence for which he was investigated, the file is kept on record and existing legal safeguards for purging his record are employed.
- No police officer shall knowingly divulge the information contained in any police dossier or information on any police investigation, completed or incomplete to any person other than the person under investigation, counsel retained by him, the committee or another police officer who has a bona fide police interest in the content of the police report or police investigation. Any failure to comply with this provision is an offence under this Act.

The Commission on Police Reform may be contacted c/o Church of Scientology, 122 Avenue Road, 967-1328.

The Commission on Police Reform (COPR) is sponsored by the Churches of Scientology in Canada as a public service although most Commission members are not members of the Church.

Involvement in the area of police reform by the Scientologists was precipitated by their discovery of a libellous report on the Church written by Interpol agents. The report has been in circulation internationally for almost 10 years and contains falsehoods concerning the Church ranging from allegations of blackmail and brainwashing to fraud. No criminal charges have ever been laid against Church organizations anywhere in the world.

The supposedly secret Interpol report was leaked to the press last summer by the German Federal Criminal Police, the German branch of Interpol. Prior to the appearance of the report in the German press, Interpol head, Jean Nepote had written to the Church denying the existence of any Interpol investigation into Scientology because Article 3 of the Interpol Charter forbids any interference with racial, political, military or religious organizations.

Scientology spokesmen claim that most rumours against the Church can be traced back to the phony Interpol report which has been circulated through most of the world's police forces and justice departments since the early 1960's. Scientology legal departments are currently bringing law suits against the various Interpol National Bureaux for over a billion dollars in damages. Church officials feel that their case is only "the tip of an iceberg" and that many groups and individuals have been the victims of false police dossiers circulated without their knowledge.

US Air Force looks for researchers at McGill

MONTREAL (CUI) — The November newsletter from the Industrial Research Centre at McGill provoked both student and faculty protest at the university. The newsletter contained a US Air Force request for scientific research "directly related to the needs of the air force."

Topics of interest to the Air Force include weapon guidance, nuclear weapon guidance, nuclear reactor safely, reconnaissance and surveillance and military flight vehicles.

"I don't think McGill should be advertising for military research for foreign powers," said professor Peter Gutkind. "Even research for the Canadian Air Force would bother me, but research for the US Air Force is really indefensible."

Director of Industrial Research at McGill, William Croft, said there is no official code of ethics concerning research a McGill faculty member can do for a foreign military power. When asked to state what rules there are, he replied, "I guess I shouldn't say this, but I don't know the answer to that question."

Croft added the "morality" of any research project can only be decided by the faculty member wishing to undertake an assignment and the people he's responsible to in his faculty. The only code of ethics McGill must comply to are in fields of animal care and medical research.

Croft said he can make no official judgement on whether military research should be carried on at McGill.

"I certainly wouldn't take part in any research project clearly oriented at blowing up my family and home."

He also said that a lot of the research currently being done at McGill "could be covered by the description in the US Air Force project list."

Croft said he didn't expect the Air Force's request to raise any controversy "because the NRC (National Research Council) in Ottawa has been conducting research of this nature for years, and no one has said anything about it. I don't see why it's acceptable for the NRC to do military research for the US but harmful for a university."

Chairman of the English Department Donald Theall is bringing the issue to Senate for a ruling on "the Ethics of Research".

Gutkind is opposed to the research because of its inherent secrecy. Such research is harmful, he said, "because a professor doing secret work can't discuss the work with his colleagues."

However, Croft said "nowhere in the US Air Force's request was there any mention of secret research."

Having also denied the existence of any secret research at McGill, Croft refused to allow any part of a research file to be published because "companies want to keep important discoveries private and not allow their competitors to see what advances they are making."

Dean of Graduate Studies and Research Walter Hithfield, whose signature must go on any project drawn up through McGill, was not available for comment.

Canada helps prolong war

Canada is indirectly helping prolong the Vietnam war by supplying oil to the US, according to a recent press release put out by the Toronto Association for Peace (TAP).

The press release states: "the barbarous bombings of the civilians of Cambodia and South Vietnam are sustained by the daily flow of over 20,000 barrels of oil from the United States"

"Canada is replenishing the supply available for this purpose."

About 50 people gathered at city hall last Friday night to protest the continuing war in Vietnam and Canada's involvement.

The demonstrators marched up Yonge Street to a rally where they listened to a speech by TAP president Hans Blumenthal, a U of T architecture prof.

TAP organiser and vice-president Katie McGovern, commenting on the small turnout said: "The peace agreements were signed over a year ago.

"Interest in Indo-China is now at a minimum."

She added: "More South Vietnamese were killed last year than Americans during the whole war."

She bases her figures on statistics released by both the South and North Vietnamese governments.

McGovern sees Canada's role in the war as quite simple.

"By selling oil to the US we are freeing (American) domestic oil for the war effort."

Canadians 'fleeced' by oil companies: Barrett

OTTAWA (CUP) Premier David Barrett of B.C. called Jan. 23 for the federal government to hold a public inquiry into the profits and taxes of the oil companies in Canada. He was speaking at a press conference held at the end of the Federal Provincial conference on energy, held in Ottawa. "The federal government is defending the interests of the oil companies at this conference by among other things suggesting that the private oil corporations have a right to share in windfall profits from the increased demand for Canada's petroleum resources," said Barrett.

He was referring to a scheme proposed by Donald MacDonald, federal minister of energy, mines and resources, which would increase the price of western crude by $2.00 a barrel (5 cents a gallon).

MacDonald proposed giving $500 million of the money raised to the oil companies.

"The Liberal government is doing this at a time when there is evidence to suggest that the oil corporations have not been paying their fair share of taxes in the past," he said.

Barrett used Standard Oil and Gulf Oil as examples.

Standard Oil of British Columbia, according to Barrett, has paid no taxes since 1965, while its profits have increased over twenty per cent per year.

He estimated that in the past two years alone this has cost Canada $10 million.

He also said Shell Oil, the world's second largest oil corporation "paid no taxes on its extensive operations in Canada from 1964-69, while making a profit of over $500 million."

At normal taxation rates, Shell would have paid $200 million.

The federal government has protested Barrett's release of this kind of information.

"The federal government is condoning this fleecing of ordinary Canadians by a foreign-owned multinational corporation," said Barrett. "This is a lot of money, and the people of Canada have a right to learn through a public inquiry how much more money the Federal Government is saving these corporations."

Another oil company crying the blues over the energy crisis has reported record profits and production for 1973.

Shell Canada Ltd. of Toronto reported a 23.6 per cent increase in profits in 1973 to $112.5 million compared to $79 million in 1972, an increase of $33.5 million.

Revenue was up 20.8 per cent to $1.3 billion from $1.0 billion in 1972. Part of the increase was due to Shell's eastern refineries, which processed about seven million barrels more of crude oil than the firm had planned.

With hankie dabbing at its corporate eyes, Shell said: "The present rate of return, while an improvement, is still not sufficient to support the enormous high-risk investment required to meet future Canadian energy requirements."

Last year was also a good year on capital returns with a return of about 12.5 per cent on capital employed, compared to 9.5 in 1972 and an average over the last 10 years of 8.5 per cent. The energy crisis hasn't slowed Shell down at all.

Actual production for Shell even with that awful energy crisis was a record 282,400 barrels of refined products and chemicals in 1973, up only a palty 13 per cent from 1972, snif.

However Shell was delighted to report the "elimination" of certain unnamed "unrealistically" low operating margins for refiners in unstated markets having "low priced offshore imports" of refined products.

Those nasty markets "have depressed prices for a number of years," Shell said, but 1973 changed all that. *****

If it's mainly because of the meat that your food bill has risen dramatically over the last few months, you should have invested your money in Canada Packers as that's where the profits went last year.

The meat packing firm registered a $3.7 million increase in profits for the nine-month period ending December 29, up 36 per cent to $13.9 million from $10.2 million a year ago.

That figures out to a quarterly return of $2.33 per share compared to $1.71 a year ago.

Total revenue for the meat people was up to $1.1 billion from $808 million a year ago, an increase of 38 per cent in sales.

The dramatic rises in profits and revenues came during the March-December, 1973, period when food prices rose quickly, during which time a brief boycott of meat was organized to protest the high cost of beef.

While profit compared to revenue is only a 1.2 per cent return for the company, investment in the shares of Canada Packers is much more lucrative.

Shares of Canada Packers have recently been trading at about $24 each on the Toronto exchange. With the latest return reported at $2.33 per share, that calculates to a return on the share of about 9.7 per cent compared to taxable bank interest of just more than eight per cent.

Snow Bowl set for Friday

The UTAU intramural sports committee will hold its third annual snow bowl football game this Friday at 1 pm on the back campus field.

An all star team picked from the other division I teams will face the Mulock Cup winners, PHE.

During the halftime, there will be a monster ball game which bears some semblance to football. Anybody on the sidelines can play and the object will be to push an eight foot ball over the other team's goal-line.

After the game, there will be a gigantic tug-of-war. Like the monsterball game, anyone can participate who has taken leave of his senses. (Just don't plan on rejoining them later.)

The following players have been picked by the coaches to represent Division I football as all-stars against the Mulock Cup Champions, PHE.

The Victoria coaches chose Tim

The coaches for the all-star team will hold a team meeting Thursday, Jan. 31 at 11 pm in the Hart House Debates Room.

Women's sports results

A double elimination women's basketball tournament (not league) was held Jan. 25 and 26 at the York Centennial Centre, where the U of T Women's senior team won the senior consolation finals.

The U of T women lost their first game to the Hamilton Brackettes by a score of 55 - 48. The top scorers for the Brackettes were Tatham (22), Hurley (10), and Jennings (8).

Williams lead the U of T team with 13 points, followed by Crawford (10) and Knight (9).

The women did better in their second game, defeating the York Raiders 54 - 38. Crawford racked up 12 points, Scott 13 and Edgar 8. The top scorers for York were Lake (12) and Geris (6).

In the championship game, the U of T defeated the St. Catherine's Panthers 67 - 41. For the Panthers were Savoie (11), English (9), and Borbath (8).

Crawford lead the team with 15 points. Other scorers were Scott (13), McIntosh (9), Williams (8), P. Williams (6), M. Williams (5), Edgar (4), Beck (3), Zukauskas (2), and Knight (2).

The OWIAA women's curling semi-finals were held in Sudbury on Jan. 24 - 25. The combined efforts of the Toronto team members, Joan Ayre (lead, Heather Gillespie (second), Nancy Slacombe (vice) and skip Mary Bullen tied with Carleton for second place in the eastern section.

The team will compete in Guelph on Feb. 15 - 16 for the OWIAA Championship.

Fac hockey raises the consciousness of the nation

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Interfac hockey continued to raise the consciousness of the Canadian people. Law II instructed Scar II on the arcane mysteries of goal setting and goal getting. Law II's goal was to get three goals and three goals they got - from Armstrong, Sheen, and Cummings. Except for Williams, Scar didn't accomplish many of their goals.

Here in the referee's own deathless prose, is a terse description of an outbreak of fisticuffs during that game. "I turned around to see No. 5 Scarborough grab a player and start to fight. No retaliation. No. 5's out." Move over, Hemingway, you've got competition.

Grad I defeated Sr. Eng 5-2. Harvey, Multo, Zuliani, McLaren and Koolwihe sprung leaks in the plumber's defences. Mitchelson and Kostuk plugged a goal each for the Engineers but it was not enough to save the Division I A basement dwellers from defeat.

St. Mike's B taught the Grad II's a thing or eight. The mikes won 8-0 on goals by Colenko, Hamilton (2), Michachi, Longo and Boot (3). Nobody, as you may have surmised, scored for the harried graduates.

The boys from Erin ravaged Meds A 4-0. Chylinski, Sloane, Boychuck and Sly tallied for Erin.

St. Mike's A overpowered UC I 5-1. Brzozowicz, Borsok and Tate (3) outscored UC's Laird.

Dent A openly flouted the Law 5-2. Barkley, Raham and Cambell scored enough goals to down the lawyers who only got goals from Morrison and Bauer.

For I chopped the pedagogues from Fac Ed down to size. That size was 3-2. Hanson, Hosick and Radecki did the measuring for the foresters. Glynn and MacKenzie tied to advance educational progress for the losers, with little success.

Scar II struck Music with a few wrong notes - eight of them to be exact. Tuters, Simmonds (3), Grosman, Williams, Cotter and Stewart scored to make it 8-1 Scar. McGregor got something on the scoreboard for Music.

The Jr. Engineers decimated PHE B's 10-0. King (2), Simpson, Gilbert (2), Klonci, Tonic, and Large (2) all got their names in the paper for scoring. Bradley got the shutout.

Raven also tallied for the Jr. Eng. "I only scored once and after that," quoth the Raven, "nevermore."

St. Mike's B tied Innis I 5-5. The magical Hamilton produced a hat-trick; O'Hara and Homer added two more goals for St. Mike's. MacMartin, Wiler, Rotenberg, Walker and Feld (sounds like a Bay St. law firm) supplied goals for Innis.

Scar I were shutout by the heartless Vic I's 4-0. McWarter, Richmond and Imamoto helped Vic give an inhospitable welcome to the guests from Scar. It was just another day in the life of Denisevitch as he rounded out Vic's scoring. Carter got the shutout.

PHE A got four goals from Walters, Achley, Bagg and Blaney. Grad I got two goals from Procnier and Zuliani. Draw your own conclusions.

Vic II dropped Trin A 5-2. Brencley, Oscapeila (musical jargon for "goal scorer"), Simpson and Tape got Vic's markers Theodore and Barber made Trin's sign of the scoreboard respectable.

Trin's bench got a penalty for having too many men on the ice. (Why are the referees always picking on those poor wooden benches that have served many students so faithfully?)

New I defeated the senior Skulemen 3-1. Tessier (2) and Cuff outscored Eng's Joyce who only managed one goal.

New also tied PHE A 2-2 on goals by Ramsden and Tessier. Bagg and Croke banged in a goal each for those strapping jocks.

Jr. Eng blasted Grads II 12-0. Sekington (5), Simpson, Reader, Durnacro (3), and Large made gluttons of themselves.

Pharm A stuck it to Mgt Stud 6-0 on goals by Marling, Walt, McQueen, Walker and Clement. Brown cackled the whole way to a shutout.

PHE B tied Innis I. Goals by PHE's Hull, Hubbell and Fenn offset those by Innis' Bouris (2) and McMaster.

The boys from Erin rode into town again and extracted a 3-1 victory from Dents A. Boychuck, Slome and Sirkoski were the hellbent marksmen for Erin while a Sage one replied for Dents.

St. Mike's dropped Scar I 8-2. St. Mike's Brady, R Rogers, Sibbit, Borscock and Flynn pushed Scar off the edge; Scar's Sullivan Wentworth scored on the way down.

For A sawed by Trin A 2-0, on efforts by McManus and Gorsline. Fac Ed held a special class at Varsity Arena to teach St. Mike's B how to lose 6-5. The mikes were obviously fast learners because that was the exact score. McKenzie (2), Plyley (2), Bougie and Glynn shared the teaching duties while Fitzpatrick, Hamilton (2), Boote and Wojenck were the class of St. Mike's goal getters.

Vic III and St Mike's B fought it out to a 3-3 tie. The St Mike's goalie stops a shot to keep the tie.

St. Mike's B then schooled Trin A in the very same virtues, defeating the bluebloods 4-2. Muthern, Hamilton (2), and Wojenck got the mikes' goals while Smythe and Barker contributed to the losing aristocrats' cause.

The school of Hard Knox suffered a one all tie with Music. (Fraser counted for Knox and Erica wrote the score for Music.)

Knox then rapped Mgt Studies 4-2 on goals by Henderson, Cathrae, Kosciui and Speers. Hamilton and Szczuinski invested in the capitalist venture.

UC I lost to Sr. Eng 3-2 despite goals by Huhtanen and Graham. Joyce led the winners with two and Sargater added another.

UC I finally did gain their first point of the season, tying Meds A 4-4. Graham, Dynes and Klassen led UC. George, Hanjoka and Foster scored for Meds.

Law II arrested New II's hopes for a victory on goals by Sleen, Fine, Cranston and Keefe (ah! this is the Bay St. law firm). The Newveau riche proudly wore a Mink goal thought the match but they should have worn more.

Vic II continued their winning ways, winning by way of a 3-1 score over For A. Goals by Lewis and Tappe helped Vic's cause; a goal by Gorsline wasn't enough to help the foresters (they obviously had a Gorsline 'shortage and couldn't travel to victory that day.)

UC returned to its old ways, losing to Scar II 9-0. Do we have to give all the names? Yes, democracy depends on an informed reading public. Be informed that Cotter, Williamson, Nash, Roshford, Grosman, Simmonds, Rubrick and Stewart (2) were the names of the heroes who will save confederation yet.

Grad I impeached Law I 3-2 on goals by Whittier, Fortin and Bird. Law had little to add, who found that goals by Morrison and himself didn't add up to a winning margin.

Grads I also tied Scar I 1-1. Multo scored for Grads and Durney tallied for Scar. Grads II met with less luck, losing to Innis I 7-1. Walker and McCauley each got a hat-trick and Ricketts added another for Innis; Marecki salvaged one for the grads.

The Fac Ed teachers strapped the jocks from PHE B 5-2. (Contrary to popular opinion, you're still allowed to give jocks a strap but they work better with two straps we've found).

McKenzie, Glynn, Plyley and Nicholson administered the punishment for Fac Ed while Sorbie and Polera gave the jocks some encouragement with a goal each.

Dent A dropped New I 3-2 on efforts by Raham (2), and Burman. Tessier and Ramsden got a goal each for New.

If your name is spelled incorrectly, that's because the writing was illegible on the game sheet. Meds A, naturally, are the worse offenders but there are others, my friends, many others.

Also, indicate clearly who your goal tender is, or we can't credit him when he earns a shutout or gets run over by the icemaking machine.

Gymnasts come third

By Bryan Alcock

The men's gymnastic team, competing without Steve Mitruk and Peter Majaro, managed a third place finish at the University of Ottawa's invitational meet. This was held at Monpetit Hall, the university's superb sports facility.

As expected, York took top honors, scoring 217.57 team points (top five scores over six apparatus. Laval (not in the OUAA) was second with 177.79, Toronto third with 163.83, McMaster fourth with 138.85, Ottawa fifth with 136.58, RCM sixth with 71.86 and Queen's seventh with 50.54.

Toronto's competing coach, Hans Frick, took second all around honors with a score of 44.65 points which included a first on parallel bars, second on the high bar, and third on the side horse. David Hunter of York won first all around.

Other all around scores for Toronto were John Fair 32.50, Brian Euler, 32.05, and Rick Jeyman 30.90. John Kelly scored 23.55 over five events, and Arnold Bishop, only doing vault and rings due to a wrist injury, scored 12.50.

This Sunday sees the team in Hamilton for the McMaster invitational meet where the full team will again try and capture the top honor by defeating York.

Either team are good enough to capture top spot.

With more dynamic and expressive routines by all the members of the Toronto team, added to the work of Mitruk, Majaro and Frick, Toronto could slip by York for first place.

This will be the last invitational competition before the semi-finals the following weekend. Since York is in the other section of OUAA this will be the final Toronto-York confrontation before the OUAA championship. This should feature both teams as each is favoured to top their respective divisions.

Hans Frick came third in the side horse competition.

Kanowitch, Anderson to discuss Code

The Students' Administrative Council decided last night to continue discussions with Simcoe Hall while at the same time building support among the student body against the Conway-Cadario code.

Seymour Kanowitch, SAC services commissioner, said there was "really no one clause of the code" that the student governments resented. Instead "there are major disagreements in the principles of the code."

"We know where they (administrators) stand, and they know where they stand," Kanowitch said, "and as long as that's clear discussing anything else (but the principles) is an academic exercise."

SAC president Bob Anderson reiterated the council's November position, calling for the approval of certain principles before the student government would accept any code. Anderson emphasized the principles of operational agreement in the classroom between a professor and his/her students, student representation on "university bodies", and general agreement with the Campbell committee principals.

ty committee on discipline which brought forward motions such as those mentioned by Anderson. The Campbell committee consisted of three faculty, three students, two administrators and one alumnus member, with Campbell the tenth person as chairman.)

Kanowitch maintained "it is totally unacceptable to us to have a code that legitimizes unrepresentative structures."

Rick Gregory, Victoria College SAC rep, said "it's time we put our (SAC's) position forward much more strongly than we have, and this means there are implications for the steering committee." Although Gregory did not clarify what the implications were he added, "the steering committee has spent considerable time bickering" within itself.

(The discipline steering committee involves any persons interested in the repeal of the Conway-Cadario code. It includes SAC, several campus political clubs and an assortment of interested individuals.)

A motion for a referendum on the discipline question to coincide with the March 3-14 SAC elections was tabled until the next SAC meeting, to be held in two weeks in a public meeting place. Kanowitch indicated SAC would have a complete list of demands "within the next few days" to take to the administration.

SAC vice-president Stephen Moses reiterated Gregory's position that "the steering committee has not functioned well. Most of the concrete results came from the petition committee formed by SAC. Its role as an organizing tool is suspect. SAC has had to carry that struggle, practically, on its own."

SAC also appointed Anderson and Kanowitch its representatives to discuss the code with the administration. However, the council also passed a motion calling that discussions be open to the university community and the campus press.

Grimy Innis houses not repaired

By MARILYN EMERSON

For U of T business affairs officer Randy Grimes, the Innis College cooperative housing project problem "is just a matter of economics."

When questioned why overdue repairs on the U of T owned Sussex Avenue houses had not been completed Grimes said: "The money can be better used in other areas."

"Besides Innis will be getting money from other sources," he added Innis will be applying for a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) loan in order to make their project, the Innex Community Corporation (ICC) a legal reality.

However, the purpose of the loan is to rehabilitate the Sussex Avenue houses for non-profit student-family living, not to fulfill U of T's financial obligations.

The city housing standards department ordered the university on July 31 to make about 180 repairs on substandard conditions on five of the 10 houses to be included in the Innis housing co-op.

By the beginning of October, when the repairs were to have been completed in compliance with the city order, none had been done by U of T, but residents report since then some minor repairs have been completed leaving some major repairs still outstanding.

Under the city's housing standards bylaw, the owner of a property—in this case U of T—is responsible for keeping a dwelling up to minimum housing standards.

Tenants—in this case the Innis co-op residents—are not responsible for bringing a house up to minimum standards under the bylaw.

Grimes said U of T had done some of the work, but the rest he said "would be taken up under the ICC project."

This means in effect Innis residents will pay for repairs U of T should have completed last year.

It may be months before the Innis rehabilitation work is begun. In the meantime very little is being done to clear the work orders long outstanding against the Sussex Avenue Houses Crown Trust administrates the houses for U of T but is not legally liable or legally responsible for the repairs.

Crown Trust housing manager John Gibson was reluctant to talk about why the Sussex repairs had not been completed. Gibson merely stated he "takes orders from Grimes."

Governing Council member W.J.D. Lewis is a director of Crown Trust.

Gibson claimed "major repairs" had been done on these houses, but would not be specific, especially about the five houses in question, 16 to 24 Sussex Avenue.

When asked why Gibson was evasive about the lack of work on the Sussex Avenue property, Grimes said Crown Trust's Gibson "was just carrying out our policy."

Grimes said "health and safety repairs" had been carried out on the houses.

Then he added "major" repairs had been completed on the houses while the "minor" repairs would be taken over by Innis residents' co-op.

When asked for specific items of major repair, Grimes said one furnace had been installed.

There are a total of ten houses which are to become co-op houses.

Contrary to the claims made by Grimes and Gibson, Innis residence co-ordinator, Laura Bradbury, said "Major work had not been done on the houses."

She added some landlords always use expenses as an excuse for raising rents when houses really ought to be

These houses go unrepaired because "the money can be better used" elsewhere according to administration in good condition prior to renting.

Bradbury said the advantages of the co-op will be good housing at low cost to students and families wishing to live in downtown Toronto.

And in spite of the delays by U of T on repairs to the properties, Bradbury feels under the circumstances the benefits of the project outweigh the disadvantages.

"The project is still a good thing," she said.

In the meantime residents 16 to 24 Sussex Ave. are still waiting for the repairs.

City council gets tough with U of T parking

By DICK BROWN

A head-on clash between city council and Simcoe Hall is in the making over U of T's parking policy.

A move is afoot in city hall to force U of T to change its parking policies to be more responsive to council's desire to cutback downtown traffic.

The move is being spearheaded by Ward 9 Alderman Dorothy Thomas who told The Varsity she is going to take the U of T issue to the February 18 meeting of the city public works committee of which she is chairwoman.

"The university must be made aware of its responsibilities," she said. "I'll see that it comes up on the agenda."

Thomas said "at least a majority" of the members of city council would approve of the move to go after U of T's parking policy.

"After all," she said, "Commissioner (of public works Ray) Bremner's parking policy passed unanimously."

That city policy, passed in the middle of last year calls on U of T to "immediately reduce the amount of reserved parking spaces provided and at the same time increase the prices charged for the use of such space."

The Bremner report terms U of T, the provincial government and Ontario Hydro "a major cause of our present traffic difficulties."

U of T's tentative parking policy, hammered out by the internal affairs committee over the last few months, calls for construction of parking structures, maintenance of the current 2,800 parking spaces, and a study on parking policy "in the context of campus environment as a whole."

While the study calls for a count of how many parking spaces U of T needs, it does not call on U of T to integrate its parking policy into the transportation policy of the city as a whole.

The dispute between the city and Simcoe Hall revolves around the city's desire to cut down traffic in the urban core as soon as possible and Simcoe Hall's intransigence in taking any immediate action aside from "studying" the problem.

In what amounts to a de facto policy of cutting the city out of the decision making on parking at U of T, the parking issue has never even gone to the external affairs committee of Governing Council, the committee with the jurisdiction to deal with the city objections to university parking.

So far only the internal affairs and business affairs committees of Governing Council have considered the issue.

Business affairs has only dealt with the financial aspects of university parking as they relate to internal university finances and not as part of an overall plan to reduce parking.

Internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway said in an interview the committee has dealt with parking as it relates to the "internal environment" at U of T.

Conway said the only way the issue could now go to external affairs would be by a vote of Governing Council's executive committee, but that committee meets behind closed doors.

In fact, the current recommendation from internal affairs does not in any place mention any sort of liaison or consultation with the city. Reference to any municipal government is absent.

However, the policy does reflect some city pressure as it states there might "possibly" be discussions with Ontario Hydro and the provincial government over parking.

So far the clearest statement of university parking policy has come from university president John Evans who told a city-university liaison committee meeting in November.

"If the municipality moved to reduce parking, we will follow. But we will not unilaterally reduce parking if transit is not adequate."

Despite the St. George campus being served by five bus lines, two subway lines, and a streetcar line, Conway claims transit is not adequate because of poor feeder services from the boroughs.

Alderman Thomas, terming U of T's attitude "arrogant," claimed the university is not even following its own policy as stated by Evans.

The city is moving to reduce parking, she said. "The university could be a follower if it wants to, that doesn't require a leadership role."

"The university claims it is not contributing to the traffic problem, but that's not true," she said, pointing to Bremner's study and U of T figures which she said proves the university is a "prime offender."

Technically the city does not have the sole power to order U of T to not build parking structures or to force U of T to cutback on parking.

However, that does not phase Thomas who said: "If they're not willing to co-operate, what we'll have to do is ask Metro and the provincial government to let us have control over all parking, both public and private in the university area."

Thomas said Uof T sees itself as "an entity separate from the city." She is determined to change that.

Africans charge Falconbridge aids oppression

By MARGARET ROBERTSON

Two representatives of the South-West African People's Organization (SWAPO) speaking at a seminar at Sidney Smith Wednesday said the Canadian mining company, Falconbridge, is exploiting their homeland Namibia and the Canadian government is unwilling to intervene.

Mishake Muyongo, vice-president of SWAPO and Peter Katjavivi, the organization's representative in Europe and the UK, said the Canadian government would rather "support stability," and it is time "a distinction is made between investment and human rights."

Muyongo charged Falconbridge is scrambling to remove as much ore as possible from their copper mines, which are expected to be depleted in about five years anyway, before the political situation forces them out.

The depletion of Namibia's mineral wealth is of deep concern to the leaders. Namibia is a very poor country and minerals are its only resource.

They fear "when freedom finally comes to this land, it will be returned to us with no minerals left ... the one wonderful asset which we have for developing the land for the well being of all its people will have been taken away from us."

Seventy-five per cent of the mine's profits go to Falconbridge and 25 per cent to the South African government, which, according to Muyongo, uses the money "to buy guns to kill our people." The economic benefits of the mines are not reaching the Namibians.

Both men spoke bitterly of Falconbridge's hiring practices, commenting to the company "things are cheap — in terms of human resources."

In the event of labor troubles in their Canadian mines the company would simply close them down, because labour is costing them so little in Namibia, he said.

An African worker's wages range from $24 to $63 per month in the Falconbridge mines, although the minimum considered necessary to maintain health is $110.

Workers are drawn from the South-West African Native Labour

Association, (SWANLA) an organization composed of employers such as Falconbridge, in a method which the non-aligned International Commission of Jurists described as "akin to slavery."

They are forced to sign 12 or 18 month contracts couched in such offensive terms as "the said master agrees to hire ... the said servant" without knowing the location of their employment, the name of their employer or the type of work for which they have been hired.

For the duration of their contracts, the workers are removed from their families and live in barrack-like buildings.

SWANLA was broken by the 1971 general strike, but the same hiring practices continue, Muyongo said.

Muyongo and Katjavivi hope to meet with Falconbridge management and trade union leaders in Sudbury, but ruled out the possibility of meeting with government officials.

"They consider us terrorists," said one of the soft spoken men, "and are afraid that we would bring bombs in our brief cases."

One student's suggestion of the offices of foreign businesses should be bombed "because that is the kind of language they understand" drew a heated response from the SWAPO representatives.

"We are responsible people, grown up, and we know what we want," they insisted.

Muyongo said they are willing to talk "to anyone" because there is "need for international understanding" of the problems facing Namibia and promoting this is the primary reason for their tour of Canada.

He insisted the only way to bring about "the right kind of change" was through pressure on those with authority.

"You go to the polls here, don't you?" he asked. Contact your M.P., both men urged several times during the meeting.

Katjavivi told the meeting that SWAPO had been formed as a nation-wide armed resistance movement in 1966 when South Africa failed to obey the United Nations termination of the mandate over the former German colony of South-West Africa.

He repeatedly emphasized, however, it was limited to small-scale guerrilla operations against selected targets.

He said weapons captured have been manufactured in France, Belgium and the U.K., and in response to a question, added he had no indication Canada was supplying arms or other war material to South Africa, but no proof it wasn't.

Katjavivi said successes have been minor but encouraging, such as a government admission of loss of men and arms.

The government propaganda claims the political situation is "under control" but cracks are beginning to appear, he said.

Internal strife is beginning to develop within the army.

SWAPO has spent much time developing and educating the people's political awareness.

"We had to overcome the emotional appeal and planned carefully to bring about the proper political orientation," Katjavivi said.

Political awareness rallies people, he added, and the result has been strikes and student unrest.

Academic affairs plaouds on with Foster

By CHRIS PROBERT

The academic affairs committee made slow progress in a meeting to discuss the Forster report Tuesday.

One uncontroversial recommendation "that there be a high degree of uniformity in standards and procedures (of granting tenure) across the university," passed with little delay.

The committee proceeded to the question of criteria for granting tenure, and the discussion became more general, with the concept of tenure itself up for grabs.

Scarborough Principal Ralph Campbell described tenure as a costly procedure, in view of the time needed for tenure considerations, appeals, and frequent anguish of those turned down, who, after a considerable commitment to the academic life, often find it difficult to get another appointment.

The virtue of tenure, in the eyes of most faculty members, is job security. In the words of student rep Gord Barnes: "tenure protects those in the university from the outside world."

However, Barnes felt "if the provincial government made an attack on the university, I doubt the university could defend itself. The province could probably get rid of people, whether they were tenured or not."

Alumni member Sonja Sinclair said she had been approached by several students who complained of professors who hold employment outside the university and consequently do not have time for students.

She suggested the definition of gross misconduct, the only cause for which a tenured professor can be fired, is inadequate.

The Forster recommendations for tenure criteria themselves were disputed by representatives of the professional faculties.

The Forster criteria are "achievement in research, effectiveness in teaching and promise of future intellectual and professional development."

The professional faculties, such as Law, or Medicine feel these criteria are more appropriate to Arts and Science.

The problem was anticipated in university president Evans' recommendations in response to the Forster report: "The 'works by which he shall be known' do not always, for professional faculty members, appear in the conventional scholarly literature."

Several reworkings of the Forster wording to allow for this factor were suggested, but the final decision has not been taken.

Chairman John Dove looks perplexed as tenure discussed

Innis residents may pay

For whatever reasons, the future tenants of the Innis College co-operative housing project face the possibility of paying for housing repairs the university should have done last summer.

This situation developed quietly over the fall with few even aware of what was going on.

In chronological order here is how the situation developed.

Innis College has been planning for quite a while to set up a non-profit housing corporation which is to be the legal entity to run the Innis co-op residence. Innis students and area residents are to make up the co-op, run it, and control it.

As required by law, the work order was issued to the landlord, U of T, which remains responsible for doing the repairs as required by law, no matter who the tenants are.

The repairs on the five houses were supposed to have been completed by October 1 by U of T, but so far, only part of them have been done.

Herein lies the confusion. The co-op is planning to do repair and renovative work to the houses and to finance that work the co-op's non-profit corporation will be getting a mortgage from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) for up to $250,000.

If the co-op's renovative work were to include the repairs ordered by the city, then it would be a duplication of efforts for the university to do the work now and Innis rip the work out later to do it again.

However, Innis principal Peter Russel reports the five houses with the work order out will have the least amount of work done by Innis.

The reason for that, according to Russel, is the five houses are already basically suitable for family living in terms of layout and need only be upgraded and possibly landscaped.

The university, by not doing the required repairs, will force the co-op to do them, and the co-op residents will have to pay the bill as they pay off the CMHC mortgage.

Just how much the residents will have to pay for university repairs is unclear at the moment and will not be known until the final architectural plans for the co-op are drawn up.

This is an important meeting for staff members to attend so we can make decisions on a collective basis. Anyone else interested can also attend, especially new reporters, who will be welcomed with open arms.

It's the latest game: chasing after housing standards, U of T and Crown Trust to get the repairs done on the Innis houses on Sussex Ave. Hint: nobody wins.

SMC development: who benefits?

The question of the proper disposal of land owned by St. Michael's College in Forest Hill poses one of the thornier problems of conflicting land use in a growing city.

St. Mike's itself is in a bind. Due to the college's religious affiliation, it has to come up with funds from outside the regular provincial financial support structure. It feels it must act in its own best interests, and secure the highest price for its land, holding.

But to whom should it sell? First option on the land is owned by Cadillac Development Corp., which wants to build a low-rise, medium-density housing scheme.

In this case, Cadillac has not turned out to be the ogre some of us have come to know and hate. It commissioned 'good-guy' Jack Diamond to develop a scheme that is quite sensitive to the issue of current land use in the area.

All well and good. But should housing be built there at all? The Spadina subway is going to pass right by the property, and people are going to want to live there. Will allowing the land to be developed for housing only increase the size of an already-too-large city?

Ontario has an acute shortage of housing and this has already been recognized in the creation of the new ministry of housing. But can any increase in housing, no matter how well designed, be permitted in a city collapsing under the weight of its population and transportation problems? If the housing is built, the problem will merely be exacerbated.

What about the residents' position? They don't want housing at all. They want both the ravine, and the tableland belonging to St. Mike's, to be used as a park. Self-interest, we scream at the owners of the Forest Hill fortresses. Keep the masses out, why don't you.

This puts the city in a bind. It is under pressure from local residents to buy the land for a park. But if City Hall spends the large sum required on this land, it will be accused of neglecting other interests.

Technically, the creation of a park will have the desirable consequence of slowing growth in the city. But who will benefit? First and foremost, the people of Forest Hill, who have their share of the 'good life' already. Moreover, it could be argued, won't the problem merely be shifted to another location without some overall control of growth?

The city must act quickly, and innovatively to put limits on its growth, in order to ensure that piecemeal approaches to the slowing of growth—such as the possible creation of a park on the St. Mike's land—do not benefit only those parties powerful and influential enough to have their own way.

The most likely outcome of the whole affair will be the acquisition and development of the land by Cadillac. The city is unlikely to put up as much money—if it offers any at all—as the developer. And poor old St. Mike's, that haven of contemplative activity, has to play the market for all it is worth.

Music dean Notes mistakes

Your issue of January 9th contained several errors in its report of the academic affairs committee meeting of the previous day, in the section regarding the committee's discussion of the Report of Relationships between the Faculty of Music and the Royal Conservatory of Music.

Number 1: Dr. John Hamilton, who chaired the study committee which formulated this report, is vice-provost of the University of Toronto, and not an officer of the Royal Conservatory of Music.

Number 2: Your reporter's statement "Most of its (the Royal Conservatory's) teaching is at the university level" should, I believe, read "Most of its teaching is NOT at the university level."

Number 3: Your report states that the Royal Conservatory is "seeking financial support from the Ministry of Colleges and Universities". This is not true. The report recommends clearly that the Conservatory should in future seek such support, but that particular recommendation was not dealt with by the academic affairs committee as yet.

A word to your printer, incidentally, as to the distinction between a dash and a hyphen, might facilitate the reading of this and other reports, errors or no errors.

Code ambiguous: Philosophy prof

In reference to the January 23 page three headline, taken from a passage apparently attributed to a member of the philosophy department, I wish to state the following: (1) It seems prima facie objectionable for a philosopher to criticize a claim on grounds of its origins, for to do so is to commit genetic fallacy. It is therefore improper to object against the view of many students on the question of the discipline code merely on the ground that "students crave excitement." (2) To make comments on the origins of an issue in a context in which the issue is being evaluated for its validity is to divert public attention away from the issue. (3) It is self-evident, as the professor implied in the article, that a code of discipline should ensure that the individual has certain basic human rights and duties, the violation of which constitute offenses against human society as a whole. However, it should be remarked that such rights and duties presuppose that the individual shall not be subject to unreasonable demands either by the administration or by the public power and shall not be subject to double jeopardy and cruel and unusual punishment in cases when such offenses are committed. It seems clear to me that the trouble with the Conway-Cadario code is that it is too ambiguous in the area of protecting the individual from unreasonable demands, protecting the individual from double jeopardy, and assuring that no cruel and unusual punishment shall be imposed on those whose "offenses" against the public order clearly constitute no more than the exercise of the rights of assembly and free speech and the "craving for excitement."

Young Socialist applauds Trots

We very much welcome the proposals in the letter from the Revolutionary Marxist Group, printed in the Varsity January 16, for united action campaigns with the objective of countering the repression in Chile.

The Young Socialists have participated in a number of activities organized to focus attention on the plight of the political prisoners and refugees and on the criminal role of the Canadian government in refusing to open Canada's doors to the refugees. Most recently we have been participating in the campaigns of the Canadian Committee for Justice to Latin American Political Prisoners (CCLA) which is organizing a wide range of activities around the issue of repression in Chile. CCLA publishes a newspaper which is circulated across Canada, reporting on what is really happening in Latin America and what the Canadian government is doing. Since the coup in Chile it has participated in a number of committees, demonstrations, and rallies, the latest being the rally for Mrs. Allende at Convocation Hall. Currently the CCLA is working for the defence of the refugees and political prisoners by concentrating on getting sponsors for refugees and job offers for the victims of the repression. CCLA is working with individuals to get resolutions put forward in trade unions and other organizations. It is working with prominent individuals, church leaders, trade unionists, professors, NDP MPs, etc., and with other organizations to expose the role of the Canadian government in denying refugees entry to Canada.

These activities give concrete aid to the victims of the repression in Chile and at the same time expose and pressure the Canadian government with regard to its restrictive policies. The RMG proposal that these kinds of activities be maintained and extended receives wholehearted support from the Young Socialists.

The RMG proposal that a Day of Solidarity with Chile be held in Toronto on the six month anniversary of the coup should be given serious attention. Such an action on March 11, if it is able to draw in a broad range of sponsors and participants, could play a valuable role in focusing public attention on the situation in Chile and on the attitude of the Canadian government. The November 27 meeting for Hortensia Allende, for example, had many positive features: it involved all opponents of the coup; it encompassed support from a wide range of organizations, from mass organizations like the trade unions and NDP to small community and radical groups; it brought out a large gathering; and it succeeded in getting wide public attention.

The Young Socialists believe that to fight the repression in Chile we need broadly-based campaigns posing the necessity of defending the people now under attack—the political prisoners and refugees. We need campaigns that reach out to the majority of Canadians; to the universities, trade unions, and mass organizations like the NDP, to bring as many people as possible into actions that will build the defence. That is the direction we would propose for a Day of Solidarity with Chile for March 11. We would propose the March 11 action be organized around the demands: "Free the Political Prisoners" and "Open Canada's Doors to the Refugees".

In order to move ahead on the proposal for a day of solidarity we would suggest that a public meeting be called at which all those interested could discuss and decide on the character of the action. This planning meeting should be well publicized and every effort should be made to ensure broad representation.

COE academics rigorous: prof.

Did not Dr. P. Meincke in his task force on education report call for the establishment of an "umbrella committee" to co-ordinate OISE, the Faculty of Education and the university?

The College of Education rejoined the university as a faculty in 1972. Perhaps the Varsity calls us FEUT only when it seuts?

This faculty is the only faculty which, in the university, concerns itself with the analysis, methodology and strategies of teaching both in theory and in practise. Our standards for the dissemination of this knowledge are rigorous. There is much, I am sure, to be learned from our colleagues in the university which will deepen and enrich our teaching and in turn, I am equally sure, there is much we could do to help our colleagues find the most effective ways to communicate their information.

I demand from my students strength, vitality, commitment, flexibility, patience, precision and organization as well as a deep and constantly enriched understanding of their subject areas and their application to all other disciplines. In order to make that demand I, as their teacher, must work at these qualities doubly hard - to bring the right personal qualities together with the most effective teaching strategies and focus them on a fool proof lesson plan, 10 times a day, five days a week—that's teaching—can standards be any higher?

Council "callous": Italian workers

As students who participated in the presentation of petitions and protest of Ian Hector at the last Governing Council meeting, we feel that some points raised in your article should be clarified.

First, substantial progress was made in stopping Hector, as a result of the militant behavior of injured workers and students. At first the Governing Council wouldn't touch the issue: they declined to move for a change of agenda. By the meeting's close, the issue had been raised and discussed, and an inquiry is on the agenda of the Governing Council's next executive meeting.

Your headline claims "Workers interrupt Council", but in fact it was the other way around. Many of the injured workers came to the meeting at great inconvenience and discomfort. They are men suffering from disabling work accidents—some of them were injured in the factories of the U of T governors themselves. To sit through the meeting until "new business", which came up after three hours, would have been an ordeal for crippled men that only a callous slavedriver would wish. So the meeting was interrupted, but it was not our intention nor the injured workers. Our actions were a result of the governors' refusal to allow us five minutes of their time, so that we could disclose the issue to all the members, because as we have seen at the end some governors had left and also the Council might not have reached to the "new business" section of the agenda.

We might ask if injured white English-speaking businessmen would be treated similarly?

The meeting was the first occasion when working people—who pay for the universities—came to challenge the teaching of the institution as being not in their interest.

Evans never claimed Hector had been proved innocent of charges. He merely claimed inquiries had been made, and that they had turned up nothing. Many inquiries turn up nothing, especially when they are conducted by those who defend their targets. Evans may have a feeble U of T version of the Watergate "cover up", but neither he nor Hector can refute the key fact: Hector's report on Giuseppe Pulera says Italians are "culturally predisposed" to fake injuries, and until Hector and Evans answer this fact, the campaign will grow and grow until Hector is stopped.

Chilean refugees policy attacked by Foster

By MARILYN EMERSON

At Trinity Church yesterday, in a discussion on the situation in Chile, a researcher for the United Church of Canada, John Foster, sharply criticised Canada's immigration policy which has only let a small number of refugees from Chile into Canada.

The discussion was moderated by U of T history professor Elliot Rose and guest speakers were Foster and a Chilean refugee withholding identification because of relatives in Chile.

Foster claimed "Canadians are poorly informed." Last October assistant deputy minister of immigration Gene Edmunds said there has been no demand from people in Chile to come to Canada.

Foster said to date there are 7,000 applications from Chilean refugees wanting to come to Canada.

He compared this figure to the 9,000 Czechoslovians immigrants admitted to Canada in 1968 and the 5,000 or more Ugandan immigrants welcomed into Canada last year.

"There are 250 Chileans here now," he said.

Foster said 27 free airlifts were provided for the Ugandan immigrants who were in the main "affluent." Many of the Chileans wanting to come to Canada are poor, and although upper class Chileans now crowd the Canadian embassy, it is the poor who are in immediate danger.

The unidentified refugee said the reception toward Chileans entering Canada has been good. He said "they are grateful but they are extremely concerned about the present situation in Chile."

"Many thousands of Chileans need to leave the country," he said. If the military junta arrests them they could lose their lives or go to prison.

"Many don't have trials."

He sees the crucial question now as "What can we do for those remaining in Chile?"

Foster said the statement the federal government will lend $650 to each of "hundreds" of political refugees expected to be admitted into Canada from Chile is misleading and not true.

The Chilean immigrant entering Canada doesn't see the grant money. On arrival Chilean immigrants are provided $20 per adult and $10 per child.

The refugee said the uniformity of reports and testimonies make the oppressive situation in Chile believable. He said it is true there is torture beatings, electric shock, shootings and murders.

When asked who are in the camps he said there are professional people, professors, and people from all sects. He said Allende's former minister of education is in a camp.

Questioned about his political affiliations the refugee said students in Chile had a choice in formulating their political philosophy. "Thirty per cent of the population are marxist." It is inherent in the political and economic situation of the country, he said.

Referring to the refugees, he said a lot of them were politically independent, some of them were of the social democratic party and others from diverse parties.

Foster said Canada ought to be more selective in choosing their personnel for foreign government positions. There is an appalling lack of Canadian persons speaking Spanish and holding government positions in Chile, he said.

He said only one Canadian embassy staff person could speak Spanish at the time of the coup.

on trial

A former U of T student goes on trial before a county court jury Friday on a charge stemming from a picket line incident a year ago when students and U of T workers were protesting student fee increases and university layoffs.

Myron Klymko plans to plead not guilty to a charge of obstructing a police constable.

Seven persons were charged in the incident with a total of 12 charges laid. To date, six of the charges have resulted in acquittals or dismissals.

Three other charges resulted in an absolute discharge, a conditional discharge and a suspended sentence. The seventh person to faces charges goes to court March 15.

Women workers exploited

By HEATHER SANGUINS

In the days of the sweat shop that great Torontonians Timothy Eaton was paying female pieceworkers in his plant the princely wage of $11 for 44 hours work.

The only thing wrong was the minimum wage was $12.50 a week said Algoma College sociology professor Mercedes Stedman Wednesday night.

The benevolent Eaton family was so nice that if a woman worker tried to organize or present her grievances she was on the street the next day.

In 1936 the wages were dropped still further. Wages were $1.75 for one dozen dresses. However if the worker failed to make her quota for the week she was sent home without being paid, and encouraged to "do better next week."

To understand how women are exploited in the modern economic system is a crucial area of study to the modern Women's Liberation Movement Steedman believes.

First of all we assume "women are exploited, and women have been oppressed." Correspondingly, in the "different stages of capitalism" there have been changes in the "nature of the oppression of women."

About women's self-image, especially as it relates to the 1930's, Steedman said "the way we see ourselves at home reflects in the way we see ourselves in the workplace."

The garment manufacturers in Toronto needed a cheap and flexible workforce because of the fashion-following nature of the business. Women were "ideal" for this because of their self-conception which allowed this to happen.

The speaker emphasized "men were also exploited." As the industry started to cut out trained tailors, these men began to organize unions.

Then the manufacturers organized a "Manufacturers Association", and women were used as scab labor. Finally men allowed women into the unions.

As the garment workers were involved in direct production, in this primary form of capitalism, "they knew who they were fighting." There was a case of "pure and simple exploitation."

Festival of Hits: more of the same

Festival of Hits
Deutsche Gramophon

The growth of "Greatest Hits" albums in the classical field has been surprising, even to cynics in the record business who thought little of the classical market. Almost every major label has a series of this type, usually divided along the lines of "Bach's Greatest Hits", "Mozart's Greatest Hits", and so on. Each disc usually contains excerpts from the best-known (which certainly does not imply best per se) works of the composer featured. The problems are obvious: how, for example, is one to choose the ten or twelve best selections of Bach, whose complete works run close to 300 records? DG's series, under the title "Festival of Hits" has tried to make the line a little more attractive in terms of content, by taking longer selections than might be expected, and by choosing some rather offbeat titles for the discs in this extensive series.

Composers like Rossini, Beethoven, Bach, and all the others are represented with individual discs, but such unknown (in the mass-audience context) composers like Stockhausen and Cage are also given discs of their own; the likelihood of either of those two having a "hit" is small to begin with. Other discs feature music of related type, such as the Mass, music for the organ, the Piano, etc.

What to make of the series, especially compared to the output from labels like Columbia or Angel? Well, the answer really depends on your own tastes. If you're the complete collector, stay away from this series and all similar ones, as you'll just be frustrated by the content. But if you have yet to really dig into the world of the classics, then they might prove good investments. Many a rookie has been indoctrinated by this kind of presentation. On the whole, though, the DG series can't escape its high-prestige appearance. Deutsche Gramophon is still, for most people, the highest quality record label in the world, by virtue of its stellar roster of artists and nearly perfect technical quality. These "Festival of Hits" discs are the same quality as the regular line,

McLaughlan shines at Massey

It could have been anything but a special event. Murray McLaughlan came on stage for his first solo concert at Massey Hall last Saturday without an introduction and just started singing. There was no big production, no flashing lights, no back-up singers, or spangled suits. The stage even looked a bit bare with just McLaughlan, bassist Dennis Pendrith and a piano. And it wasn't until Murray finished his second song that he said anything.

He spoke in a shy little-boy manner, almost as if it were an aside. "I'd like to welcome you all to Massey Hall. Pause. 'I'd like to welcome me to Massey Hall'." It provided the nexus between audience and performer. From that point on the tone of the evening was set.

McLaughlan could do no wrong.

Murray sang only his own compositions. Almost all were from his three fine LP's Day To Day Dust, Murray McLaughlan and Songs From The Street. And from the degree of applause before and after each song, it was clear that the audience knew his songs well.

A major change in McLaughlan's performing has been the addition of piano. On at least six numbers, Murray traded his guitar for the keyboards. He did an especially fine job pounding out Hurricane of Change, Big Bad City and You Need A New Lover Now.

Two new songs were introduced. One called Where The North Winds Blow, was inspired by a trip to Montreal to do a benefit for the James Bay Indians. It ended with a sentiment of bitterness and frustration, I wish we killed the white man off, back when we had the chance. The other new tune was a little lighter in mood. Honey Let's Get Up And Dance was about "whining and snivelling". We can move to the jungle of the change that's in my pants/We ain't too old yet/Honey let's get up and dance.

McLaughlan's performing was strictly A-1, the sound system was perfect and the audience was a joy.

It was the best concert Murray McLaughlan ever gave.

allan mandell

and are priced the same way, $7.98 list. There's the rub.

If you build up your collection from budget lines like Seraphim or Adyssey, then you can have complete compositions instead of just the bleeding chunks that "Greatest Hits" records give.

What's more, the price rarely goes above $3 per record, making them sound buys in these vinyl-short times.

Stick to the carriage trade, DG. Your "Festival of Hits" are just too rich for the beginner's tastes.

AFRIK

— A "STIMULATION GAME" FOR STUDYING TANZANIA

International Student Centre
33 St. George Street
Tuesday evening February 5, 7-9:00 p.m.
Thursday afternoon February 7, 2:00 p.m.

February 1 to 10 has been declared "Ten Days for World Development" by the relief and development agencies of Canadian churches. During these ten days local groups across the country, be it in classrooms, social centres, or church halls, will focus on the problems of the developing world, a struggle which excludes no country.

Africa has been given a particular focus. A game "Afrik" was designed for the Vancouver committee of "Ten Days for World Development". This game or technique helps introduce Tanzania's development policies to a group of people relatively uninformed about Tanzania. The group is presented with a hypothetical island nation at the time of independence. The members of the group are then asked to pretend that they are the nation's leaders and to set guidelines for the nation's development. The characteristics of the hypothetical nation are similar to Tanzania's. A ready comparison can then be made between what policies the group has set and Tanzania's policies.

"Afrik" will be played at the International Student Centre twice during the ten days - Tuesday evening, February 5, 7:00 p.m. and Thursday afternoon, February 7, at 2:00 p.m. Everyone is welcome to participate in the game. Several groups can be formed if there are many people. It could prove to be a most intensive experience, as well as an opportunity to achieve a greater appreciation of development issues.

How Hugh Hefner got the girl next door (snicker) and turned her into a bunny

By LINDA McQUAIG

Nancy isn't the sort of person you'd normally bother to read an article about. At 20, she's had a pretty normal, everyday sort of life, working as a dental assistant, booking hotel reservations for rock groups and spending a lot of time doing gymnastics. In fact, if it weren't for the fact that the running commentary on her rather dull life is interspersed with full-page nude pictures of her, needless to say, no one would read it. But then everyone knows that a Playboy centrefold isn't chosen for her views on world politics. Publisher Hugh Hefner has always said that his "Playmates" are supposed to remind the reader of the "girl next door". Yet one can't help but get the impression that Hefner is being a little hard on the girl who really does live next door — while she may not be as well-built as the one in the pictures, she couldn't possibly be that dull. Reading Nancy's account of herself is about as exciting as listening to Johnny Carson interview a 5th rate movie actress who's just dying to tell you all about her latest film.

(And Nancy is no ordinary Playmate. She was the lucky one chosen to be spread across the pages of Playboy's special 20th anniversary issue of January '74, and the first playmate ever to have her back view featured on the flip side of the three-page fold-out. Said Nancy: "I'm flattered to be chosen to be Playboy's first double-gated Playmate". Nancy's back side and an interview with Hefner are the treats offered on this special occasion.)

But why does Playboy bother with all the chatter between the skin shots? Is all this talk (and it goes on long enough to appear every now and then between 10 pages of colour pin-ups) merely filler? Not entirely. Nancy's life story has a moral.

First, Nancy is no dud. She doesn't sit home and knit. She's highly active in sports, has held a variety of not-purely-routine jobs, as well as being secretary of her junior and senior classes at school, drum major and, in her own words, "principal's pet and all the rest." She may even be intelligent. But Nancy isn't exactly what you'd call a strong individual. She makes it pretty clear that she takes a back seat to her boy friend Paul. She's really impressed with Paul and credits him with introducing her to many of the exciting things that she says have happened to her since she met him: "Since then I've done things I never thought I'd be doing, met people I never thought I'd meet, had experiences I never thought I'd have." And it's pretty clear that Paul is boss. He is, in fact, her boss. She left her job as a dental assistant to work for Paul, who is a rock-concert producer. The nature of their relationship is further revealed by a picture of Nancy (fully clothed, even) leaning on the front of Paul's car, which just happens to be a Rolls Royce. Nancy explains: "The Rolls has to be kept tuned constantly. Paul doesn't let me work on it too often, but I gladly do what he lets me." Maybe for a special treat he'll let her clean the windshield? Not one to quarrel, Nancy perches demurely on the front of the car looking at a book while Paul manfully tinkers with his Rolls in the background.

The saga of a typical day in the life of Nancy drones on. Now she moves to the gym, changes to a tight black gym suit and is seen leaning chest-downward over the uneven parallel bars. She says: "I've been a gymnast my whole life, as have my parents and their parents before them. We're all Slovak and it would be hard to find a people crazier about gymnastics than the Slovaks. Since my mother is an instructor and sisters still compete, I guess we can match any family as gymnast fanatics." The day winds up with Nancy and Paul sitting around a campfire with a group of groovy young people like themselves in a scene reminiscent of the type of beer commercials that used to come on during football games.

So a day that began with a chest shot of Nancy in the shower, moved to the Rolls Royce scene, then the gym, then Nancy on assignment as a demonstrator for a cosmetics firm, ends up with she and Paul relaxing with the gang. A day in the life of a typical couple? Hardly. But it's been a day that most Playboy readers would give their tightest turtlenecks for.

So the running commentary beside the pictures has been more than a space-filler. It's given Playboy a chance to construct the image of a way of life filled with money, leisure and a big-breasted woman who looks up to her man.

This has been Playboy's "contribution" to the pornography business. Sex magazines have always offered men an opportunity to gawk at women's bodies, but it was Hefner who first turned the sex magazine into a package deal — a ready-made fantasy that not only provided a man with visual sexual stimuli but also allowed him to imagine himself in a world of luxury, sophistication and ever-willing women. (It is easy to understand why Playboy is reported to refuse advertising for acne medication — how can a Playboy reader really immerse himself in the fantasy of being a smooth operator with a host of pliant women at his call if, at the same time, he's being reminded that he's really a pimply-faced loser?)

Hefner claims that Playboy's great innovation in the pornography world was the creation of the girl-next-door pinup. This

Playboy still tilting at those Puritan windmills

Is probably true only to the extent that perhaps men can more easily imagine themselves sexually involved with a centrefold who is supposed to resemble the girl next door (regardless of whether or not she actually does) than with a famous movie star. Nonetheless, famous movie stars have traditionally found their way onto Playboy's pages with little protest from the readership. Paul Gebhard, director of the Institute for Sex Research in the US, probably hit closer to the truth when he attributed Playboy's success to its technique of linking sex with upward mobility. Hefner seems to like this idea and says he set out to create a magazine "free of guilt about sex and the benefits of materialism". In fact he seems to see little distinction between the two. It all can be consumed, be it cars, golf clubs or women.

formula. There's a fear more crucial, but difficult-to-pin-down element. Nancy again offers the clue. As we have seen, she is active, and energetic but not exactly a forceful person. There must be nothing more gratifying to the male ego than reading about a girl like Nancy. Voluptuous, cheerful, unassuming, and most impressive with her boyfriend. (One wonders whether an account written about Paul would contain as many references to Nancy as hers does to him.) In fact, reading about a girl like Nancy is almost enough to let a man (or boy, as the case often is) forget that he's living in a world where he's not always boss. Despite the fact that men dominate the political and economic sphere, the average male is constantly confronted in his private life with women who aren't necessarily weak-willed. Most males have to deal daily with mothers, sisters, female teachers and classmates who exert strong influences on them. These kinds of women naturally pose a threat to any man whose ego demands that he not be ruled by, or even complete with women. The Playmate allows him to escape from all this into a world where women are beautiful and uncompetitive. Hefner admits that he likes this kind of woman: "I tend to be attracted to the sort of woman who isn't competitive and doesn't feel frustrated or resentful because she isn't in charge... I don't go looking for any sort of challenge in a romance... A romantic relationship for me is an escape from the challenges and problems I face in my work." The Playmate certainly isn't going to challenge him, just make sure he's having a good time.

Fantasies, of course, are much easier to believe in if they fall within the realm of possibility. Hefner conveniently offers himself as evidence that the Playboy world does exist; his life is the fantasy come true. Surrounded by all the luxuries of sheer extravagance and a never-ending line of willing women, Hefner appears to lead a life that is just one titillation after another. As he so profoundly put it in the interview: "I feel like a king in the world's biggest candy store."

The moral is: If a man as unattractive as Hefner can make it, then it really is true that all a guy needs is a $200 million financial empire and he can have just about as many insipid women as he wants. Hefner spends much of the interview talking about his life at the two Playboy mansions, giving just enough detail stir up the imagination of his readership without destroying the mystery, which, of course, further reinforces the cult. The interviewer, Larry Dubois, helps him along and together they drop hints about how exciting things really are there at the mansion. Hefner: "After the meetings, dictation and editing are done I'm ready to relax and play — whether it's in my rotating bed or in the game room with the gang. Dubois: "Or in the rotating bed with the gang?" Hefner: "You've been peeping."

Hefner not only presents the image of a man who is immersed in a never-ending world of pleasure, but also a man who has control over his own life. In Hefner's world he is in charge. To the average male, who often feels powerless in his job or personal life, Hefner offers the image of a man who orders a vast financial empire from his revolving bed. Hefner plays on this theme himself, implying that he stands apart from the crowd while others submit to the dictates of society. He says that he started out working as a copy writer in the promotion department of Esquire, until his boss refused him a $5 raise. "I not only didn't get the raise, the head of the promotion department spent almost an hour trying to convince me that I wasn't a good 'Company man'... he was right." The implication is that Hefner was too much of an individualist to make a good company man. Company men are 'yes' men, right? and Hefner's no 'yes' man, right? He says: "One of the greatest sources of frustration in contemporary society is that people feel so powerless, not only in relation to what happens in the world around them but in influencing what happens in their own lives. Well, I don't feel that frustration, because I've taken control of my life."

Hefner seems to be attributing his ability to set his own terms to his forceful personality (he's no Bunny, you know). Of the man who commutes to work he says: "He's living his life according to some pre-conceived notion — certainly not his own — of what a daily routine ought to be. I've eliminated that problem by having my office, personal staff and a conference room here on the premises." What Hefner fails to point out is that the reason he's master of his environment is that he can afford to be. Most people with financial empires in the $200 million range do manage to skip the daily subway ride. Hefner even attributes his rejection of women's liberation to his individuality: "I'm not going to pattern my life after some fashionable notion of an emancipated relationship in which both partners are equal. If that works for others, that's OK, but it wouldn't work for me. I admit to being a rather strong-willed individual. I make most of the decisions in my life, and I like it that way."

So, while the Bunny offers the image of the pretty pliable woman for the Playboy reader to fantasize about Hefner offers him the model of the strong independent man, for him to emulate — the kind of man who's on his way up in the world, like the guy in the Playboy cartoon who, while preparing to insert his penis into a secretary before the eyes of a prospective employer, glibly announces: "I believe your firm can use a man like me, sir. I'm young, aggressive, and I won't take no for an answer." Insipid women, aggressive men — pre-conceived notions, anyone?

The Playboy fantasy, then, is just an elaborate version of the old cliché — that men are strong, independent individuals who naturally dominate women, who are weak-willed. As Hefner well knows, the easiest way to make men feel that they do, in fact, dominate women is to portray women as weak. But some women don't like to be thought of as weak, which accounts for the fact that Playboy has stirred up considerable opposition from women over the years. This upsets Hefner, who likes to think of himself as the friend of women — besides, it's much more difficult to come across looking like a champion of sexual liberation if the opposite sex is screaming exploitation. Hefner tries to get around this by supporting certain goals of the women's movement that don't threaten the Playboy world — notably freer abortion laws, greater access to birth control, and legal rights for women. Beyond this, Hefner has little sympathy for the women's movement — understandably — it isn't in the interests of a beef farmer to promote vegetarianism. Hefner reveals in the interview that he finds the easiest way to deal with his opposition is to distort it. He claims for instance, that he supports women's liberation except when it tries to make men and women the same, which is, of course, not at all what it's trying to do. When it comes to what the movement actually is trying to do — namely to destroy people's "pre-conceived notions" of male domination, Hefner's words echo loud and clear: "I'm not going to pattern my life after some fashionable notion of an emancipated relationship in which both partners are equal." Playboy's real enemy isn't puritanism, as Hefner likes to think it is, but rather women who don't like to be squeezed in between wine and song on the list of life's great pleasures.

But Hefner prefers to see puritanism as his arch enemy, the force of oppression that is keeping the world safe for virgins. It's a much easier opposition to fight — mainly because it's been almost totally discredited to the point of being laughed at by the majority of the population. (Besides, it's always easier to fight people who are trying to impose something on you rather than people who claim you're imposing something on them.) So Hefner fights on, despite the lack of real opposition, daring to defy every nun and librarian in the crowd, tossing out the slogan "puritan hang-up" as if sex before marriage really were still a rare phenomenon. Hefner sees the forces of virginity closing in on him from all sides. In true paranoid style, he declares: "Because there is an enemy out there. This country — indeed the whole world — consists of two opposing forces: us and those who would force their values and beliefs upon us."

It must be getting more and more difficult for Hefner. When Playboy began 20 years ago, there was much more of an enemy out there. Many people did object to Playboy on the grounds that it was too explicitly sexual. But people have changed. Playboy has become an accepted institution. It's the type of magazine that a "respectable" young lawyer could be seen browsing through without raising an eyebrow. It's sold in "respectable" drug stores, alongside Esquire, Time and Newsweek. As Playboy's "enemy" has dwindled, however, Hefner has been unwilling to give up the fight and acknowledge that he's no longer taking on the whole establishment because, for the most part, he is part of the establishment. (Just because he wouldn't be welcome at the Vatican doesn't mean he hasn't made it.)

Hefner reveals himself to be much less adept at handling any other form of opposition, which perhaps explains why he attempts to portray all opposition as rampant puritanism in disguise. (He manages to get away with this in the anniversary interview chiefly because Dubois, the interviewer, lets him.) Dubois makes the observation that "many women find the image of a pin-up nude dehumanizing." No, says Hefner, claiming that Playboy has, on the contrary, humanized the pin-up concept by making the subjects more realistic. "The entire girl-next-door concept that we created for our centrefold was intended to make the Playmates more a part of real life for our readers," Hefner says, as if the fact that the girl in the picture resembles Susan Smith down the street or your best friend or even YOU YOURSELF suddenly changes the nature of the act of reducing yourself to the level of a sexual toy. (By the same logic, a black man would prefer to see a fellow black perform a degrading task — rather than see a white man do the same one — because at least he could identify with the black!) Satisfied that he has adequately handled the point, Hefner tries to steer the argument back onto familiar ground and once again sees the spectre of puritanism closing in on him: "If some people still consider it dehumanizing for a woman to appear naked in the pages of a men's magazine, they're really objecting to the sexual connotation in the pictures, and that's just the same old repressive puritanism under a different label." Satisfied also, Dubois moves on to the next question. Hefner pays even less attention to it. Dubois says: "As you know, some feminists think that... the Bunny costume is demeaning to the wearer." Instead of even attempting to counter this, Hefner outlines the history of the Bunny costume and concludes, somewhat away from the point, "the word Bunny has even entered the language as a synonym for a pretty girl."

Mostly, however, Hefner tries to dismiss his opposition by pointing to the good causes Playboy has supported and the sexual freedom it has championed for women. This is true, to a certain extent: the most notable example being its crusade against abortion laws. Yet, in the long run, Playboy has done more to harm women than to help them, for the toughest battles women face are not legal but conceptual and Playboy, more than any other single force, has contributed to the image of women as merely sexual playthings. By creating the Bunny, Playboy has held up as desirable a type of woman whose chief function is to satisfy and flatter the male. So, while more sexual freedom for women can be achieved through liberalizing abortion laws, real sexual liberation isn't just the opportunity to have more sex but rather to have better sex. And as long as Playboy contributes to the image of women as just another treat at the mansion, the chances of men and women being able to relate to each other sexually in an open, equal way will be slim. Hefner closes with this final tribute to himself: "Well, if we hadn't had the Wright brothers, there would still be airplanes. If there hadn't been an Edison, there would still be electric lights. And if there hadn't been a Hefner we'd still have sex. But maybe we wouldn't be enjoying it as much."

Spirited chamber group must fight to survive

Sunday the New Chamber Orchestra of Canada showed a packed crowd at Hart House why it's the up-and-coming ensemble in this country. Led by conductor Walter Babiak (a change for this usually conductor-less group), the evening began with a somewhat shaky performance of Brahms' "Liebeslieder" waltzes, 18 short waltz pieces written at a particularly happy time in the composer's life. Unfortunately, ragged intonation, especially in the opening for waltzes, prevented the playing from reaching the standard Babiak was aiming for.

The group had a chance to relieve itself, in the next number, Bloch's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra and piano. This is a strong, moody piece, one which might show off its musical sonorities better in the company of a full-size orchestra. Notwithstanding this, the Orchestra gave its all, with Babiak bringing out the inner voices in an especially pleasing manner.

The evening's last work, Shostakovich's Piano Concerto No. 1, is a rarely-heard piece bristling with humour and flashes of virtuosity. Featured soloist Sheila Henig brought it off with the élan that the work needed. Not to be ignored was the performance of trumpeter Bill Phillips, who handled the solo part with ease. The full title of the music lists the trumpet on an equal basis with the piano, but with the exception of the last movement, it never really comes up to that level of importance. By no means is it inconsequential though, and Phillips kept the much louder sound of his instrument from overpowering the piano's, no easy trick, given the acoustics of Hart House's Great Hall.

Needless to say, the audience went mad at the end of the last movement: all was sweetness and light as dozens gathered in the music room upstairs to congratulate the performers. But a pall hung over much of the proceedings, for a very serious reason: unless some means of funding can be found soon, the orchestra will simply collapse, as the Montreal Symphony. The orchestra's Local Initiatives Project grant has bitten the dust, and the group is ardently trying to find some alternate source of funding.

What makes the potential loss of this fine group so tragic is the contribution it has made in its short life to this city's cultural life. Considering the Hart House series alone (and ignoring the school concerts and other shows given during the year) we have had a procession of Canadian artists giving us evenings of consistently enjoyable music, and mucus not heard very often (if at all, in the case of last Sunday's Shostakovich).

The Toronto Symphony will be around for quite some time to come, but do you really want to hear chamber music played by a wrong-sized group, in a wrong-sized hall? I don't, and I'm sure any member of the new Chamber Orchestra's audiences would agree. If the three concerts in its series at Hart House are a good indication, the New Chamber Orchestra may be the most important ensemble to ever grace Canadian concert halls.

Black Sabbath is evil to your ears

Sabbath, Bloody Sabbath
Black Sabbath
WEA; $6.29

If anyone out there has ever wondered what was happening with Black Sabbath, then one listen to their new LP makes the answer obvious—nothing. The band is still bogged down with the same ideas they had when they first emerged in 1969-70, in the wake of Led Zeppelin's meteoric rise, into the world of heavy rock. The band relies upon the wall of sound provided by Tony on lead guitar, Geezer on bass and percussionist Bill, but Ozzy's bleating vocals and pretentious lyrics tend to mar the whole thing. Whereas the band appeared able to play and perform when it began, Sabbath Bloody Sabbath seems lifeless and boring, a rehash of old material.

Black Sabbath, as the name implies, became identified with a musical trend that emphasized evil, and the lyrics of most songs included a paranoid concern with death, hell, the afterlife and the grotesque. Tradition wins out on Sabbath Bloody Sabbath, but unfortunately it's like flogging a dead horse and, while it might turn some people on, it's absolutely pointless.

Of the eight songs on the album only two manage to stand out, but they do so for varying reasons. "Sabbra Cadabra" is interesting because it's a love song, and as such totally unexpected. But since it's done with the group's usual heavyhandedness, not even the presence of Yes's Rick Wakeman playing piano and synthesizer can salvage the effort. The second tune is a beautiful instrumental offering called "Fluff", featuring Tony on acoustic and steel guitars, piano and synthesizers, with Geezer on bass. The group has done it before and both times it is surprising to note that they are capable of producing light, understated compositions. Among the monotonous dullness of this LP "Fluff" is a true game.

The implied evil, suggested by the cover work on Sabbath Bloody Sabbath, is actually a warning to the buyer to beware before wasting money. The living horror of listening to this LP is only heightened by the realization that you've been taken. Pass this one up,

The story of the baritone and the baton

Schubert: Symphonies No. 5, 8
("Unfinished")
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau,
New Philharmonia Orchestra
Angel S-36985

Settle down, kiddies, and listen to a strange tale. Once upon a time, there was a world-famous baritone with a predilection for recording anything with the name "F. Schubert" printed on the top. A big, wise promoter came over and said: "Dietrich...I found something with the magic name on it that you've never recorded!" Naturally, the baritone leaped up in a frenzy and dashed off to the recording studio and faced the music. But, lo and behold! Instead of words, he found many different lines on the music to follow, and he couldn't sing them all at once... and he was so dumb-struck by this strange sight that he picked up a stick (conveniently placed by the promoter just near his right hand) and flailed away in frustration at the air for lack of singable verse. A group of nearby orchestra musicians saw the ruckus, sat down and played a couple of Schubert symphonies as accompaniment to the mute singer's antics.

Just then, the promoter (English majors can substitute some Symbolism here) cackled with glee, threw the switches on his recording console and preserved the zany moment for all time. And that's how we happen to have a new release with Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau conducting Schubert's 5th and 8th symphonies.

Well, ahem. It didn't really happen just that way, all you literally-minded types, what did happen though is pretty similar. Obsessed with the conductor's art, F-D has taken up the baton as a second instrument (so to speak) and Angel has seen fit to record the proceedings on vinyl.

To the uninitiated peruser of this column the name Fischer-Dieskau might not mean much, but as the man who has recorded every Schubert song (over 500) and has appeared in operas from Mozart to Hindemith, he is perhaps the world's most-recorded singer. The switch to conducting is surprising, but not unprecedented, since conductors such as Bernstein, Toscanini, Walter and many, many others started out their musical careers as mere instrumentalists.

What turns a player into a stick-waver? Probably the irresistible urge to say "I can do it" to the public, and the desire to transcend the limitations imposed by being shackled to one instrument, one style, one repertoire. Fischer-Dieskau was hardly locked in with the available vocal repertoire, but there really is nothing to compare to standing on the podium facing 110 or so musicians. Even organists don't have that much at their command. An orchestra is the greatest musical instrument ever invented, and once that fact is discovered, the hapless convert is hard-pressed to return to his or her meek beginnings.

I don't doubt that F-D will keep up with the singing, but let's face it—the pipes won't be in top shape forever, and Dietrich may be taking a cue from the late Pablo Casals, who found conducting vastly rewarding first as a supplement to his 'cello playing, and later as his sole occupation when his age prevented him from performing on his instrument. Our boy may be sailing away his talents for a rainy day. On the subject of the present recording, he couldn't have chosen a better vehicle for a debut in the world of vinyl. It may be a truism to say it, but the symphonies on the disc sound just as if he were singing them, for the same generous, able phrasing highlights the long lines. The tempi are on the quick side, but this provides a more optimistic sound in the Unfinished than many conductors favour. The New Philharmonia's playing is expert throughout, with the possible exception of the violins in the opening bars of the 5th symphony.

This isn't the Schubert record to end all, because the music shines under different interpretations. Suffice it to say that this record will please all those who like their Schubert warm and pleasant. If this renowned baritone ever tours on this side of the Atlantic again, run to get tickets, even if he never opens his mouth at the concert, because he's now shown that he something to say with the baton as well. dave basskin

Allman's solo hits a new high in muzak rock

Laid Back
Greg Allman
Capricorn (WEA); $6.29

When Greg Allman's solo debut LP arrived, I saw it as his chance to do some exploring outside the already established musical scope of the Allman Brothers band. Unfortunately, instead of an improvement, he provides us with what can be best described as "muzak rock". It's as if the chance to work on his own erased from his mind everything he ever learned about rock music.

Laid Back wins my nomination for the "most likely to put you to sleep" award hands down, and on the whole seems like a terrible waste of talent. For all his experience Allman has burdened his record with dull, unimaginative arrangements which, despite all efforts by the sidemen and horn section, are further hampered by the strings. Pianist Chuck Leavell, percussionists Butch Trucks and Jaimoe (from the Allman band) and the rest of the musicians, try very hard to help out, but without the support of a lead guitar, they are unable to overcome the sluggish pace set by the violins.

The tension created between the two sections is felt throughout all eight compositions and comes to a climax on the old Allman Brothers hit "Midnight Rider". The band does all it can do to speed up the tempo but is virtually smothered by Greg's monotonous moaning and the lush strings. The backup vocals and the horn section are wasted as the song develops at a snail's pace, remaining lifeless and devoid of meaning when compared to Joe Cocker's version. On "Queen of Hearts", a slow ballad enhanced by Leavell's piano and a biting sax solo, and "Please Call Home", another old Allman composition, Greg seems to do his best to bore the listener with expressionless singing and, with the help of the violins, transforms both songs into limp and whimpering tear-jerkers.

The only saving grace of this record is "Don't Spoil a good thing", a fast toe-tapper, as the band goes all out playing solid rock. Very similar in structure to Marvin Gaye's old hit "Ain't that Peculiar", it features Greg singing as he meant it and getting real support. A beautiful sax solo places this cut miles above the remaining tunes on the LP, but it still lacks the help of a lead guitar to make the whole effort pay off.

The remaining cuts include an acoustic version of Jackson Browne's "These days", which features some good double tracked singing by Greg and a crisp steel pedal accompaniment. The traditional hymn "Will the Circle Be Unbroken" develops around a funeral dirge rhythm set by the muffled drums, and builds up to a joyous hand-clapping climax as the piano and backup singers set the pace. It takes on an extra meaning when one realizes that after the death of brother Duane and bass player Berry Oakley, the future of the Allman Brothers band seemed threatened by disaster.

So there it is, Greg Allman laid so far back as to make this LP a gigantic downer, not suitable for car trips or dull rainy days. While fans of Johnny Mathis, Shawn Phillips, Richie Havens and Joan Baez should feel right at home, I prefer to wait for the Allman Brothers live at Watkins Glen LP.

The Chalmers: a Canadian almost-academy award night

Since special awards to Canadian playwrights are a rare and wonderful thing, the atmosphere of not exactly electric but certainly flickering tension at Monday night's Chalmers Play Award was an interesting reflection of local theatre kinetics.

Of 88 eligible entrants (Canadian plays produced professionally in the area during 1972-73 and reviewed by Toronto critics, going as far afield as Stratford and the Shaw Festival), 37 were selected as being of special worth. From these, 5 finalists were announced as contestants for the $5,000 award given by Floyd Chalmers to the best Canadian play of the year.

This year the five honoured playwrights were Michael Ondaatje for The Collected Works of Billy the Kid, performed on The Third Stage at Stratford last summer, Martin Kinch for his autobiographical play Me?, seen at Toronto Free Theatre, Michael Tremblay for Les Belles Soeurs, the St. Lawrence Centre's final smash hit last year, James Reaney and his ensemble collage play Sticks and Stones: The Donnelly's Part One, which played to sold-out houses at the Tarragon Theatre this year and David French Of the Fields Lately, the sequel to Leaving Home, which also played at the Tarragon Theatre this year.

And the winner is...In a mini-Academy Award hush...David

French for Of the Fields Lately. Although the Sticks and Stones crew were there in full force with justifiable expectation, the final choice played it safe. Of the Fields Lately is a beautiful naturalist-realist play about the death throes of a father-son conflict and residual family life, with which most people who saw the play managed to identify. It has been tossed off as a domestic television play of the '50s, rubbied in the sentimental dirt of melodrama but also hailed as a poignant poetic drama of real-life experience. Since the more radical and avant-garde works in terms of theme, structure and political consciousness played second to the readily accessible emotions of Fields, it would seem that Canadian drama is celebrating itself in a predictably cautious fashion. But Michael Tremblay's Hosanna will have two performances in Toronto this year (in both French and English) and James Reaney has yet to present us with Sticks and Stones: Parts 2 and 3. So it is almost certain that these two playwrights at least will be back in the running next year, and then we shall see.

The four semi-finalists were given $2,500 to divide equally and a brief spotlight on centre stage at the St. Lawrence Hall. Michael Tremblay (who has stated that he is not a Canadian playwright but a Quebec playwright) managed well as our representative French-Canadian and choosing to stand if not fight on foreign soil, remarked in English that he hoped "this will help you understand us." James Reaney in his delightful whimsical way upstaged everyone by recalling that we were all standing on the spot where the floor had caved in a century before.

And so it went. The humble beginnings perhaps of better things to come in Canadian theatre, an attempt "to record the progress and mark the excellence," along the way and a night in which some recognition was given to our losses and our landmarks: on the debit side, the two Toronto theatres Theatre Passe Muraille and Factory Lab (among our oldest) now without homes and severe grant cut-backs to many Toronto stages, on the credit side, the Toronto Drama Bench, an association of local critics and reviewers who selected the best plays, the Canadian Theatre Review, a new publication written for and about the Canadian theatre scene of here-and-now with hopes of encouraging its future and the Tarragon Theatre who produced last year's winner Creeps, plus Leaving Home, Of the Fields Lately and Sticks and Stones.

It was not an evening of glitter or greatness because we have neither regressed that far nor achieved that much. But as an evening in tribute to the many actors, directors, producers, and playwrights who turned up to support their own, it was an acknowledgement of productivity and future possibility.

Classic-rock Focus misses aim

When a British music poll voted Jan Akkerman the best lead guitar of 1972-73, the basic reaction in North America's music circles was one of amazement. Everyone knows that the best musicians in rock, especially lead guitarists, are British, so who—or what—the hell was Akkerman?

The trouble, of course, was the fact that, while Focus was building up its name and reputation in Britain, their records were hardly getting any airplay in North America. Well, it appears that Akkerman has decided to prove his skill as the top guitar around and has released at least three solo LPs and appears as a guest sideman on a few others.

So Profile is a showcase because on it he not only plays bass, lead and Spanish guitars, electric piano, and alto lute, but is credited with all but two of the compositions performed. Side

One is called "Fresh Air" and is made up of seven separate yet interrelated sections, that suffer from the same problems present in the live Focus LP. It's an intricate effort but it's too crowded and the many nebulous ideas just don't get off the ground, with the result that the whole thing is an enormous bore.

The flip-side concentrates more upon the acoustic skills of Akkerman, as he plays the alto-lute with a classical emphasis. And while one can't deny that his playing is just beautiful, his choice of material is quite easily forgotten. The whole album is lacking in life and comes off as a gigantic ego trip.

While several classically-oriented groups and musicians have a definitive direction, Focus and Akkerman appear to be missing most of the time.

Forgettable tit-bits

All you never wanted to know about Canadian literature

The Supplement to the Oxford Companion to Canadian History and Literature, ed. William Tey, Oxford University Press $9.50

This is from John Glassco's Memoirs of Montparnasse.

"Who is your greatest Canadian poet?" he asked politely.

"Do you mean in French or English?" "Why, do you have both?" He seemed delighted. "But of course, you have the département of Québec. Well, then, who is the greatest poet of Québec?"

"In the past twenty-five years you have a choice between Morin the Canadian Gutier and Choquette, the Canadian Hugo, and Nelligan, the Canadian Verlaire."

"Then there is no Québec poet in himself?"

"None that I know of." "What about your English Canadian poets?"

"We have Lampman, the Canadian Keats, and Carman, the Canadian Swinburne. We also have Smith, who is sometimes hailed as the Canadian Yeats but whom I prefer to all of them."

"May I ask if you yourself are already the Canadian avatar of someone else, and if so of whom?"

"So far I have not donned any mantle at all, but it was not easy. This is probably why I embraced surrealism."

"I can understand, it was a way out." "At least, Canadians are finally beyond that particular provincialism."

Or are they?

The entry about Dennis Lee in the Supplement to the Oxford Companion to Canadian History and Literature says:

"In this cultural concern he is a sort of Matthew Arnold, unbearably conscious of our discontinuity with the past, of our loss of faith in God and in human values and institutions."

His poems "in which images of alienation, absence, loss and disinherence abound have some of the ratiocination and anger of John Donne's sonnets, which they resemble in a number of ways.... At times his manner and matter remind one of Pound's Cantos."

Arnold. Donne. Pound. Yes. But how many people have ever heard of Dennis Lee?

Nothing is quite so damning as too much praise.

The leading essay in the issue of the Times Literary Supplement devoted to Canadian literature last fall (Oct. 26) is entitled "Canada's Elizabethan age?"

Written by Ronald Sutherland, the article proclaims that "in terms of dynamic activity, excitement, experimentation, even spirit of discovery and chauvinistic pride, Canadian writing is now going through what might best be described as its 'Elizabethan' period. Whether or not a Shakespeare or a Ben Jonson will surface from the current whirl of soul-searching and literary outpouring still remains to be seen."

Another essay in the TLS special issue quotes a question Malcolm Lowry posed to his parents when he first went to British Columbia in 1939: "Who knows but that I might not become a Canadian Ibsen or Dostoevsky? They certainly need one. They haven't got any writers at all: they all became Americans if they do well."

Canadians will always interpret Canadian literature in terms of other literatures. And more and more so.

Do not be fooled. People are not reading Canadian literature any more than they used to. They are quite simply reading more about it.

That's progress?

No.

No, it's not.

But it has definitely given rise to a distinct publishing trend.

Never is so much being said by so many about so few.

The Companion to Canadian History and Literature was published in 1967.

This Supplement deals with works of Canadian literature and historiography published between the beginning of 1967 and the end of 1972.

Quick. Name more than 10 such works.

The supplement is useful if you want to know writers' middle names: Margaret Eleanor Atwood, Pierre Francis de Morigny Berton, Herman Northrop Frye, Douglas Valentine LePan, Alfred Wellington Purdy.

No doubt it is a readily available source of information for obituaries.

The entry on John Robert Colombo who seems more and more to be becoming the Canadian Truman Capote (it's catching!) notes that he "has edited numerous books, beginning with the Varsity Chap book (1959), which contained some of his own poetry together with the poetry of other students at the University of Toronto."

It is surprising to note really how many English Canadian writers have been at the U of T at some stage of their education.

Surprising too to note how many writers and historians are Rhodes scholars who came back.

And there are interesting tit-bits of information.

The entry on Milton Acorn explains why he is called the "People's Poet".

"When the Governor's General's Awards were announced in 1971 and I've tasted my blood failed to win, a group of Toronto poets gave a party for Acorn at Grossman's Tavern, awarded him 'The Canadian Poetry Award 1970' and dubbed him 'The People's Poet.'"

I'd always wondered. Nevertheless I do not know why this book was published. Or rather I see no truly pressing reasons why it should have been published.

The book is already in parts out of date.

Margaret Atwood "is on the board of directors of the House of Anansi Press;"

"In 1973 Austin Clarke was appointed to the Metropolitan Toronto Library Board;"

"Harold Sonny Ladoo, a twenty-seven-year old native of Trinidad now living in Toronto...."

The out of date information can be corrected. Of course. But what is involved here then is a commitment to an endless series of supplements.

But is this what Canadian literature needs?

How often is a supplement to the Companion to English Literature issued?

The book implies that the chief value of Canadian literature is its contemporaneity and as well as exalting the Canadian writer it exalts the Canadian reviewer.

Yet the book also implies that the reviewers are not doing their job very well.

But does it do a better job?

Norah Storey's reviews especially are unfailingly uncritical.

George Woodcock says of Kildare

Doobs that he wrote a "somewhat lyrical travel book" on Canada.

Cutting, cutting. And it is, in the context of the other entries.

Sutherland comments on the importance of Canadian literature as a clue to the present:

"Whatever happens in the future, coming to grips with the ideas which will shape the nation's very destiny that is what contemporary Canadian literature is all about...."

"In fact, a common characteristic of contemporary manifestations of nationalism in Canada is rejection of the past as a controlling force. Sometimes it leads to devaluation of non-Canadian antecedents, to distaste for premeditated 'internationalism'. One younger critic recently went so far as to pin 'Uncle Tom' labels on Professor Frye ('our leading internationalist critic'), E. J. Pratt, ('our foremost colonialist poet'), and Mr. Richler ('the most accomplished Canadian writer of British novels in our generation')."

There is something neurotic about this—they seem to feel that if there is ever going to be a Canadian literature it will have to be now.

For tomorrow we will all be Americans. Do they know something we don't?

But is the present the best judge of the present? By the hesitancy of the contributors to the Supplement to actually judge I think not.

And praise, continued praise, begins to pall. Either we have to treat literature as literature and judge, or we have to realize that we are not dealing with literature at all but with journalism, and political treatises and sociological works (But then we have to judge these political treatises as political treatises....)

1967, granted, was Canada's year. But this is 1974.

And 1974, what with the recent awarding of the Nobel prize for literature to Patrick White and the even more recent opening of the Sydney Opera House, seems to be Australia's year.

You read what's being written about Australia now and you remember what has been written about Canada and I tell you it's enough to make you wonder whether you can believe what you read.

Just which country is it that is the hope of the future? Tell me again.

The forces of history meet human beings in The Emigrants and The New Land

Jan Troell's two-part film The Emigrants and The New Land is the best movie I've ever seen. Of course, like love, I've had the feeling before. Movies invite infatuations. But this time it's the real thing. Infatuations fade with contact, love and The Emigrants grow.

To be sure there is something idiosyncratic in my admiration for Troell's epic of nineteenth century migration and settlement. Like Viva, masterpieces bore me. But after double viewings of both The Emigrants and The New Land, totalling nearly 12 hours, I can honestly say I have not been bored a moment. Of course one shouldn't be bored in the presence of so much talented effort, but that has never stopped me before. But this masterpiece is different. It doesn't look like other movies; what's more, it manages something I've never seen another movie do: it maintains a double focus on its characters and on the historical force that propels them. The great migration and Troell's singled-out emigrant family illuminate one another like a candle held in front of a mirror. Is there another film that has taken both planes seriously? Invariably American movies reduce history to "period", a device for throwing lovers together and pulling them apart. The Russian epics, on the other hand, seem to acknowledge no passion but one for social justice. The one is sentimental, the other pious. It seems to be up to the in-between countries, up to the Czechs and the Swedes, to worry the relation of people and their times.

The Emigrants and The New Land are historical works (though of the most artistic sort) and it is here that I admit the idiosyncratic part of my attraction. I love history. Not, of course, the battle and treaty kind, but the kind in attitudes. This is a delicate, narcissistic concern, but it has overtones of reality. These parents and grand-parents—who paradoxically strike me as less far away each year I get older—formed Canada and America, or at least a very large part of the arrangements we call by those collective names. The Nilssons of Troell's movies are of an age with my grand-parents' grand-parents, their grand-children, my great grand-parents. That is not so far back. For all the remoteness of their pioneer (or ghetto) existence, their traumas and defences still reverberate in our relations. Some of their 120-year-old concerns, rendered so understandable by Troell, are quaint, some have the ring of old lore, some the frustrating tenacity of out-moded fears and myths. Others remain as current as the new season.

If The Emigrants was, as Film Quarterly suggests, better received in America than in Europe, this must be why: when Karl Oskar Nilsson softens his wife's longing for home by assuring her that their children will be thankful, he is speaking of us. Of course we do thank (though we condemn as well) but with a sophistication well outside the pioneer ken of this ancestor. Not Troell's ken: he looks at what America is and was (and what it never was) with an eye as clear as de Tocqueville's or Marx's. That it is also an artist's eye makes the history feel even more accurate. As an artist Troell is less committed to his discoveries than a professional historian, and therefore less likely to over-estimate their importance. Some of the Nilsson family experiences are clearly formative, others are hopelessly anachronistic. As an amateur, Troell needn't have strictly to support hypothesis. There is evidence here to support history as class struggle, and evidence to support history as one damn thing after another. The contradictions are disarmed by the convincing human style of the characters, and by their beauty.

Acknowledging Troell as an artist separates him not only from most historians but from most filmmakers. The Emigrants and The New Land are vastly different from the elegant natural clichés of the Sierra Club books, and so many other grandly photographed movies. The shots are, of course, composed and beautiful, but they also carry a hint of further, more ambivalent meaning. A duck gliding on a still lake is dwarfed by its long, wide, unencumbered wake. An Indian's canoe makes silent, ludicrous progress across a distance of copy water. A leaf quivers and oddies a foot above the ground as if dangled from a spider's web for the camera to record; then, after a long, justified time, Troell refocuses revealing a second leaf in the same motion, as if to confirm the first in its quirky, unnatural routine. Such shots are the norm in Troell's movie.

Liv Ullmann's performance as a pioneer woman is her greatest role.

Little did the emigrants realize what awaited them in their new homeland.

As director, Troell works his actors with the same austerity and flare. Tom Fouts, as a Baptist parson married to a vivacious immigrant Swede, is proud, righteous, jolly, embarrassed, concerned—though he doesn't speak a word and appears in only one sequence. A Mexican sound-dough (the actor is not listed on the credit sheet) flies in the face of the long history of cinema racism by turning out to help and care for a would-be Swedish gold-panner. The contradiction of his bandito looks and his human action wordlessly puts one in touch with one's own deeply internalized prejudice.

When Troell turns his camera to Liv Ullman or Max Von Sydow it is the kind of artistic pas de deux that is the dream of performers in any art form. He works Liv Ullman's marvellous, pliant features for all their beauty and all their gawky, fearful self-consciousness, in trying on an Americanized friend's new hat (a luxury as far removed from her pioneer existence as a parasol) her face is a full opera. The "bit" was a nice little conception, but Ullman lights it up like a lamp and it becomes one of the most touching comic images ever on the screen. Troell demands of his leading actress more resources than most directors would think of: she must face a new husband, homesickness, childbirth, death, and disease.

Ullman calls on unprecedented reserves, having a fresh and appropriate mien for every demand Troell makes. If she never finds another role of this magnitude—and she may not—she has proven herself. I don't think there is another actress who is her equal.

Max Von Sydow, of course, has had great parts before, and he plays his Karl Oskar with fewer stops pulled than Liv Ullman's Kristina. He is not, at least to these eyes, too stolid, although he and Swedes in general are not new to the accusation. It is a reserved performance as one imagines one's great, great grand-parents were reserved, but it is quickened with hints of bafflement and pride, when his face trembles at the death of a loved one, whiskers smile after finally staking his claim, or when his face trembles at the death of a loved one, they are apt, memorable expressions. This is the real strong silent figure that has been displaced by the John Wayne caricature. Karl Oskar is a hero in a sense where heroism is a conclusion one can draw about some men's lives. Wayne's heroes are the childhood fixations of hacks who mistake courage for lack of concern for life.

For all the copy spent in praise of freedom and spaciousness as the cornerstone of the Western (and with it the American cinema), I have always thought pulpiness was the real common denominator. So The New Land, which is a Western, but not one written in pulp, doesn't seem to be a Western. Its conflicts are too complex, its conclusions too subtle. Westerns probe—if they probe at all—the distant problem of killing. The New Land explores death. (In fact there are so many deaths, and each is so carefully distinct, that you wonder how Troell got so intimate with the topic. I suspect most film-makers settle for killings because they are blank with fear at the real question.) If there was ever a movie of the real West, a Swede has made it. While Arthur Penn tried (with Little Big Man) to apply compassion and a fresh critical eye to the genre, he was sunk by the style: while we knew those massacres occurred, they still looked too much like Hollywood history to affect like human history.

But Troell has his own rhythm and style that themselves deny the old studio dominance of movies. He is more like a turn-of-the-century photographer than a 1970s cinematographer: his movie is incidental, like a book of photographs where a page is turned when the number and arrangement of the pictures dictates. It's a choppy and unbalanced but ultimately natural and infectious rhythm, the rhythm of one damn thing after another. Again and again the script seems to halt to allow a silent shot (in effect it is a photograph) to replace a whole scene.

When Troell includes a pictorial essay on the Lincoln government's mass execution of 36 Sioux Indians, it is like a sudden, public section of a photo album, separate from the family history on the adjoining pages. The pictures build on one another and work slowly but incessantly deeper into the memory: these proud, scared adolescent Indians; their young guards, faces washed of all expression; the strange, desperate, reverential death chant—these images become indelible in the memory, an inherited scar.

Not everyone is as moved by The Emigrants and The New Land as I am, and while it is universally acknowledged as a masterpiece, it is one some people appreciate rather than enjoy. The unbalanced rhythm throws some folks off. (To be fair this may in part be the result of Warner's shortening of the film for the American market. Nearly 30 minutes was cut from the first half. I don't know how much from the second.) I also suspect a reverence for cabins and pioneer technology is necessary to dispell some impatience. I have the reverence, and as I say, I wasn't bored for a frame, in fact I would like to see the out-takes.

The other main complaint, particularly about The New Land, is the gloom. While The Emigrants matched its sufferings with hope and humour—I thought it quite a funny movie—The New Land is almost universally hard and tragic. Were the films shown together or back to back as they were intended, this might make a point about the dream of emigration. But separated by a year, as they were for North American release, Troell's vision appears terribly sombre.

But even in its original form it is clear that Troell's work has left some questions, and some of them important questions, unexplored. Of course great art always leaves you unresolved, but here the gaps are a bit too wide. Towards the end of The New Land, the movie starts speeding up like Mark Twain's watch, with years passing by in seconds. It's a particularly unfortunate loss because what is jettisoned is Karl Oskar's meetings with his growing and ultimately grown children, the crucial third act of the social history, the fulfillment and shattering of the emigrant's sustaining dream of thanks. There is some indication of it in The New Land: Robert (Eddie Axberg), Karl Oskar's younger brother returns from the West, in effect the first "American". Though still speaking in Swedish, he uses his words differently, more symbolically, embodying the germ of the angst that has come of the American Dream. He is a frustration and bafflement to his patriarchal older brother ("He speaks in riddles" Von Sydow complains.) Robert's riddles are the force of history as it passes from Karl Oskar. His children, we are told at the end of the film, no longer speak Swedish, but we never see his face as the change from Swede to American becomes more and more apparent. One wants a third "Emigrants" film because it would clearly be our story. It is a disappointment that the company has disbanded and the film will never be made. Someone else may attempt it with some other story, but it looks to me as if the only film-maker one could trust to do it justice is Jan Troell.

As mentioned in last week's Whatsup, January 31 was head-off night for four new productions on local stages. Theatre du P'tit Bonheur is presenting Faut Qu'Tu Fasses Ta Vie, a collage of humorous sketches and monologues, and Joulez-Moi D'Amour, about a young Quebecois who meets a French prostitute and experiences unforeseen communication problems. The Academy of Theatre Arts at 23 Grenville Street works with Max Frisch's which haunts you even when you read it. An adaptation of Barry Broadfoot's novel Ten Lost Years, a humanitarian exposé of the depression years in Canada, is the subject matter of the new Toronto Workshop production and Total Eclipse, a play by Christopher Hampton about French poets Rimbaud and Verlaine, is in performance at the Firehall Theatre.

Coming up soon is the first show by the Playwright's Production Company who are planning a series of workshops for new Canadian plays. Based on a script-in-progress idea, the first presentation will be Monday, February 4 and Tuesday, February 5 at the Actors' Theatre, 390 Dupont Street. Admission is pay-what-you-can. The series will continue with a new production on the first Monday and Tuesday of each month throughout the year.

Finally Black Theatre Canada, a new community theatre, will establish itself as a formal theatre company with the coming production of its first play Mafinla or Heart of a Child. The play is a folk drama about the trial of three murderers in purgatory and starts February 8 in the Old Church Theatre, Bathurst Street United Church. Performances are Thursday through Sunday evening at 9 and Saturday and Sunday afternoon at 4.

String Band, the all-new beefed up version is at Egerton's, corner of Gerrard and Church (860-0036), next week, starting Monday.

The Scarborough College Winter Carnival seems to be the best way to kill this weekend. Tickets for the entire weekend which includes dances, movies and concerts are a paltry $3 (available from SAC). You might especially take note that folksinger David Wiffen is in concert tomorrow night at 8:30 at the Meeting Place. Tickets for Wiffen only are $2.50.

The Riverboat is closed this weekend, but Tommy Makeem opens on Tuesday. Bruce Cockburn will be in for four days on the following week.

The El Mocambo, 464 Spadina at College (961-2558), has some impressive talent lined up. Country Gazette, a four man bluegrass group featuring a couple of former Flying Burrito Bros, including fiddle player Byron Berline, is in residence tonight and tomorrow. (By the way, it was Berline who added the fiddle licks on Steve Stills' first Manassas album.) Bonnie Bramlett opens on Monday, backed by a nine-piece band. Fairport Convention with Sandy Denny follow her for three days only (February 11 to 13).

Scottish traditional singer, Norman Kennedy is at Fiddler's Green (489-3001), tonight only. Michael Cooney, 'the one-man folk festival', appears on Tuesday. Admission is $1.

The Open Circle Theater 99c Pot Luck continues tonight and tomorrow at 102 Bellevue, 2 blocks west of Spadina and College. As the name suggests the entertainment is pot luck, but you're likely to hear Bob Bossin, Synergy and Pierre Gallant among others.

Hello, you grubby masochists! If you're reading this it must mean you've decided to stay around our glorious campus for the interminable joys of the Winter Essay Season! Naturally, this restricts your mobility and leaves you at home facing snarling piles of books that demand your attention. Sooooo...if you have to be locked up, why not pass the time with a little music? All you need is an FM radio and a high tolerance for dull announcers to get wave upon wave of stuff from CBL-FM and CJRT. These stations have a more-or-less continuous policy of broadcasting classical music, with an emphasis on jazz in the late evening. It does make quite a difference from spooky-voiced DJs and pant stores trying to sell you a mystical experience instead of jeans on CHUM-FM.

Sunday evening at 8:30, local jazz-man Greg Waters leads a quintet at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, 390 St. Admission is $2.50 for students, $2.50 for big folks.

Speaking of CBC, a series on Contemporary Chinese thought is slated for the "Ideas" series, next Monday through Friday evenings at 10 p.m. The series features experts on China, the U.S., Britain and Australia (why not China?). All you sinophiles take note.

Supertstars: Maria Callas is making what will probably be her last Toronto concert ever, later this month. If you want to see this show, getcher self over to Massey Hall's Box Office now, and line up. Seats go at $10, $17 and $25, more if you want them inside the building. Another world-class soprano to visit this burg will be the great Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, making one of her annual tours. It's at Eaton Auditorium later on in February as well. Both are, as Capitol informs me, Angel recording artists, with over 40 discs each in the current catalogue. With vinyl skyrocketing in price the way it is, those $25 seats may be a better bargain than they appear. And of course, there's Nureyev himself appearing with the National Ballet later on. The first week looks to be the most interesting in terms of program (unless you get off on Sleeping Beauty more than anything else, as many do) with The Moor's Pavan on the bill. Having seen this short ballet, based on Othello, with music by Purcell, I can say that it's one of the most intense 4-dancer pieces, just teeming with power. If the cast consists of Nureyev, Veronica Tennant, Karin Kahn and Frank Augustin, it could be the highlight of the whole season, strictly in terms of dance quality.

art

The surest way to tell something about a young artist is to look at his drawings from life (i.e. from the nude). These give you an inside look at his problem solving procedure in the same way as, fishing for an analogy, the manuscripts and notebooks of a poet tell you about his. They are not public statements and are free of the posturing - the straining for "newness" and "originality" - that characterizes most paintings by young artists. The New Chamber Orchestra in line with its policy of sponsoring exhibitions of young artists at its concerts at Hart House exhibited last Sunday works by Andrew Prychodko, a young Canadian studying in Florence and making his Canadian debut. His drawings were very strong but his one painting in my opinion was very weak; judging from the former, however, he definitely has what it takes.

The Hart House Gallery is having a retrospective of L.A.C. Panton, a nature painter of the thirties and forties.

A slip of the type-writer last week turned the Cinematek (on Yonge five blocks North of Eglinton) which specializes in old American musicals, epics, independents and revivals, into the Revue which goes more by critical acclaim in its booking. Sorry. Tonight is the last night for Jacques Tati's Playtime at the Revue, which Wednesday and Thursday will show Bergman's Passion of Anna. We haven't received the February list from Cinematek yet. Monday night Wild Strawberries is back at Ontario College of Art, and Thursday, the noisy Roxy presents, at long last, The Projectionist with Billy Liar. And we can't go. When will someone show Joe Gordie, and when will they bring back The Projectionist?

Impressive debut for Stringband

Canadian Sunset
Stringband

Nick Records; $3.00

Canadian nationalism is a false issue in music. Just look at the effect of Pierre Junesau's Canadian content requirements on the industry. They've done little more than aid the proliferation of the Anne Murrys, Edward Bears and Guess Whos. The "progressive" musician, who dares to widen his scope beyond the confines of AM radio, is fighting an uphill battle.

But lately, the musicians have begun to retaliate. Instead of compromising artistic ideals, more and more are bypassing the traditional channels and producing their own records independently. Perth County Conspiracy and the Original Sloth Band have already made the plunge. The newest group to move in that direction is Stringband.

Stringband came to be about two years ago in Toronto, when Marie-Lynn Hammond moved here from Ottawa, and met up with Bob Bossin. Both had been writing songs on their own and saw strength in a musical coalition. The sound they wanted in their music called for a well-oiled country fiddle, and Jerry Lewycky was added. These three formed the essence of Stringband. Recently Lewycky left the group, and was replaced by Ben Mink. Other additions are Al Soberman on bass and Doug Bowes on piano and guitar.

Stringband went into the recording studio in August with an armful of original songs by Bossin and Hammond and the little cash they had. The final product, a shiny vinyl disc, containing 16 (yes, 16!) tracks plopped into their penniless hands a few weeks ago.

Canadian Sunset is an impressive first record. Production was handled by well-known Toronto percussionist Bill Usher (who's recorded with David Wiffen and Bill King among others), with assistance from Bossin, Hammond and John Morris.

The album is one of those sit-down feel right at home records that makes your spine tingle. The strong point is composition. Both Hammond and Bossin work hard for interesting lyrics, with phrases that kind of jump out at you, and memorable melodies. Bossin has a line in "Lady Permanence," a song about a woman who owns a "hotel", with no rules on the back of the door, that mentions the old butler Mr. B. Wright Down/And his son B. Wright Down II.

There's a lot of variety on the album from comfortable Morning and "La Chanson Francaise" to country flavoured banjo and fiddle songs. Some of the songs date back over two years but "Hoedown" is probably the newest song on Canadian Sunset. It was composed by Bossin in one day this past summer, and spotlights some incredible soaring fiddle by Ben Mink, plus fuzz guitar and conga drums (so this country music). Mink does his best to make you believe the line devil got the fiddle, and the old banjo. The other tunes that strike me most are "Country Music", which features some fine dobro sounds from Frank Barth and Marie-Lynn Hammond's silky vibrato drenched vocal, "Daddy Was a Ballplayer" and "Vancouver".

Hey Vancouver

You're as grey as where I come from Still you don't quite feel the same Cause home is where your friends are
And where your beginnings and ends are

There are a few weak spots. Bossin's vocals, especially when he's in the background tend to get lost occasionally and some of the instruments, like the dobro should be a bit more up front.

Canadian Sunset is packaged in an orange and green cover and each bears a different picture postcard, getting as close as I've seen to an original cover for each record. A lyric sheet is also included. The record is selling for $3 and is available at Round Records and other major downtown stores. A few of the outlets have boosted the price 100% (their own profit of course), but negotiations are underway to have the price lowered or stop their sale. The band should be applauded for keeping their selling price within reason.

Shortly after the record was completed Bob Bossin's banjo was stolen. Anyone who may have a good old banjo for sale or can't find a copy of Canadian Sunset should call Stringband fanclub at 922-3714.

Well you can play that oldtime music
You can sing those country songs

Waterpolo season begins

By MICHAEL MILNE

The first two weeks of the waterpolo season were much the same as in past years, with lopsided wins and defaults predominating.

In division I, it looks like Knox and PHE will be fighting for top spot, with Vic I, Trin and Eng I about even. SMC has defaulted out of the league.

In division II, Meds and Vic II are off to a good start. The other four teams, New, Dents, Wyc and Eng II are of variable strength.

The results of the first two weeks of play were as follows:

Division I
PHE	10	Vic I	6
Knox	9	Eng I	1

oops!

In last Monday's swimming story, we said Michigan State was coming to the Benson Building this Sunday.

Actually, it should have said the University of Michigan was coming, an irate student from that university informed us.

"It would be like calling you the sports editor of that Toke Oke newspaper. You wouldn't like that, would you?" he screamed, blood boiling.

Hang us from the highest yardarm, sir; boil our knees in oil (if you can find any); tear our Speedo suit to shreds, and then, if it pleases you, accept our humblest apologies... but never mention the name of that scurrilous rag around here! After all, there is such a thing as common decency.

U of T faces dilemma on northwest campus

By KATHERINE ROWCLIFFE

The university will eventually have to decide between economics and community sentiment in determining the fate of residential property it owns on the north west campus.

A unique and diversified community is developing in the area bordered by Spadina, Washington, Harbord and Huron St. The tenants are now mobilizing in an attempt to preserve their neighbourhood which is owned by the university.

In an attempt to familiarize members of the external affairs committee of Governing Council with the university's land holdings, business officer Randy Grimes conducted a tour of the area Saturday morning.

Representatives of the Huron-Sussex Ratepayers Association were also present.

Grimes explained during the tour how the university buys available land in the area if the price is considered reasonable.

A recent acquisition shown to the group was a $58,000 house on Spadina Avenue which Grimes admitted was too large for the average family.

He said it would probably prove most economical if managed efficiently as a boarding house.

Grimes said repairs for the home which has been vacant for one and a half years have been estimated at a maximum cost of $20,000.

The university has, during recent years been making similar acquisitions in the area, with an eye to expansion after 1980.

With the cutbacks in government expenditures and the decline in student enrolment however, the university now realizes it may have to live with these properties for a period of many years.

This, in essence, makes the university a landlord. The university has promised the tenants that other than the Innis College co-operative housing program, no new construction is planned for the area before 1980.

In the interim, repairs must be made on the homes which have been previously neglected.

Tom Harper, president of the Huron-Sussex Ratepayers Association, said the tenants do not want the university to sell the land because intense commercial development would be inevitable.

At the same time Harper explained the university seems eager to paint the exterior of the homes while willing to leave plumbing in need of repair.

Harper admitted the tenants walk a tightrope and have public opinion as their only bargaining strength in their love/hate relationship with the university.

Harper stressed relations between the tenants and university were very good but expressed concern that rents raised excessively in an attempt to pay for the needed repairs would force certain members of the community including welfare recipients to leave.

The tenants are eager to preserve the diverse character of the neighbourhood and do not want it to become exclusive.

Most Sussex Ave. repairs still uncompleted

By BOB BETTSON

While the ball has gone bouncing back and forth between U of T and Crown Trust over the completion of repairs to 16-24 Sussex Ave., the tenants have been left with over 60 per cent of repairs uncompleted.

According to housing inspector supervisor Dick Hope the matter was thought to be resolved.

"There have been some repairs done, I've seen them myself," he said.

Hope, however, said Thursday this was on the condition any remaining repairs were assumed by the Innis residents when their Innis co-op housing corporation takes over the 10 houses.

A work order was first issued for five of the houses in July.

Hope said U of T had waited until three weeks ago to complete repairs which housing standards designated as necessary for "health and safety. These were not a significant number."

"My information is the question has been ironed out completely," he added.

But according to the Innis plans the five houses concerned are not going to be extensively renovated so the question arises whether U of T and Crown Trust are just trying to avoid paying for the repairs, letting the residents pay for them.

Members of the Governing Council's external affairs committee viewed the Sussex Ave. houses Saturday while being shown around the north west campus area on a tour designed to familiarize them with the area.

When informed Innis was not going to be involved in wholesale renovations of all of the houses concerned, Hope said in this case "we're going after them."

He said a significant number of repairs had not been done, the winter delaying outside work in particular, but said: "We won't let it go on forever."

Hope said he doubted it would go to court because it is just a "misunderstanding." He said he would be in touch with U of T to get things straight about the repairs.

Keil Gregory, from business affairs vice-president Alex Rankin's office, said Thursday he was sure the repairs would be covered by the Innis renovations. "All the houses are being renovated as far as I understand."

Gregory added the Innis co-op would have to assume the remaining repairs even though this is not specified in the lease, yet to be signed.

"If Innis doesn't do it, we'll do it," he stated.

Namibia freedom fighters will use 'all means'

By BOB BETTSON

Mishake Muyongo has a price on his head.

He is vice-president of the South West African People's Organization (SWAPO) fighting for the liberation of Namibia from the clutches of the neighboring white supremacist regime of South Africa.

Muyongo, visiting Toronto as part of a Canadian tour, said in an interview yesterday SWAPO is involved in a liberation struggle and will use "all means to gain freedom for our people."

Muyongo said SWAPO is involved in a vigorous political campaign to complement the armed struggle involving industrial strikes, student walk-outs and teacher rallies.

His compatriot, Peter Katjavivi, working for SWAPO in the United Kingdom, said the armed struggle Ordinarily the Canadian press — unlike the British — ignores Africa, added Katjavivi.

They both emphasized corporate involvement as a prime factor in perpetrating the oppression of their people.

"South Africa depends on the respectability of the international corporations," said Muyongo.

He charged the multinational corporations with using blacks as "slave labor" and helping the South African government to kill Namibians through their royalties paid to the Pretoria government.

When asked about the extension of apartheid into Namibia, Muyongo said it was worse for blacks because they are sealed off from the outside world. If anyone dissents, he said, they are arrested and shot or sent to prison.

He is personally wanted by the South Africa government dead or alive, for his activities with the liberation movement, a large reward riding on his head.

He lives in neighboring Zambia, sheltered by the friendly black government. He travels to Namibia underground to retain contact with SWAPO activists there.

The complicated history of the League of Nations mandate gained by South Africa in 1920 and now assumed by the United Nations, is largely irrelevant to the struggle, said Muyongo.

However the organization has observer status at the United Nations and has made diplomatic contacts with many countries.

The SWAPO spokesmen rejected South Africa's claims of sovereignty saying there was no apartheid and white supremacist government when the mandate began.

They also pointed out Namibians had governed themselves before South Africa ruled but their population has been forced into slavery and servitude since then in the name of "protection".

"Apartheid is an ideology based on racism and used to maintain the white supremacist system," Muyongo said.

Describing SWAPO Muyongo said it was a mass movement linking all Namibians in the struggle for their independence. No one is refused membership and the party presents a united front.

involves not only the guerrilla struggle in the rural areas but urban guerrilla activity involving selected military and business targets.

Muyongo said although there are significant arms shipments from Eastern European countries, SWAPO is not committed to a particular political program, except a free democratic government after liberation.

Muyongo said most of the material support comes from the Organization for African Unity as well as the socialist countries and the Social Democratic European regimes.

They both voiced hopes for more ties with the people of Canada through the sympathy of various organizations and unions to counteract the oppression which they feel is perpetrated by Canadian corporate and government policies.

However they have to face what they call a "press blackout" in getting their message to the Canadian people.

Muyongo said the only time Canadians hear about Africa is in the case of a coup d'etat or a bloody war.

Landmark case on censorship begins today

What may well become one of the landmark legal cases in Canadian law begins this morning as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Globe and Mail, and the Canadian Liberation Movement (CLM) square off against the Canada Metal Co. Ltd. in what boils down to a censorship hearing.

Technically the issue before the court today is whether the three groups violated a January 29 ex parte injunction against the CBC prohibiting broadcast of certain sections of a special radio show on lead pollution.

The hour-long documentary presented on the "As It Happens" radio show Tuesday, had sections of the broadcast deleted following the court action by the lead company.

At issue was sections of the program critical of Canada Metals. Those sections alleged the firm had not done all they could to relieve lead pollution and that testimony in an earlier court action involving Canada Metals was misleading.

However the larger issue to be wrangled out starting today is the issue of prior restraint, a form of press censorship which historically has been one of the battles the press in the western world has had to fight periodically.

Prior restraint is simply a government or private persons preventing publishing or broadcasting news material prior to the release of the material to the public.

In Canada, prior restraint is an almost unknown quantity.

The lead company is seeking a contempt of court citation against the three organizations for violation of last week's order, a citation which could result in jail terms.

It was 1965 when the last reporter in Canada was cited for contempt of court for a story, and that was after the story was released to the public.

Prior restraint, however, has been fought by the press because it is often allowed a person or organization to be criticized in the press to censor the press' comments prior to publication.

The Canada Metals action is a case in point.

The Globe ran a review of the CBC radio show the morning before the show was broadcast. That story said, in part:

"A doctor whose evidence helped get a court to allow a smelter to stay in operation despite apparent lead poisoning in three nearby residents admits on the program that evidence that might have made her change her stand was concealed from her."

That story prompted the legal action against the CBC later that day.

The paragraph referred to a legal action last year in which the Ontario government tried unsuccessfully to close Canada Metals for alleged lead pollution.

The government's only expert witness, Dr. Henrietta Sachs, was the doctor referred to in the Globe story and on the radio show.

The CLM is being brought into the issue by describing Dr. Sachs in a leaflet which read, in part:

"Dr. Henrietta Sachs, a so-called expert from Chicago admitted she had made a mistake in her early statements on Canada Metal because the company had withheld and distorted information. Either Dr. Sachs had to admit the Canada Metal Co. bribed her and she lied or she was 'sucked in' by the sharpies at Canada Metal!"

Notwithstanding the deletion of various sections of the radio show in compliance with the ex parte injunction, the CBC is still being taken to court by the metal company because of statements still in the show.

One such statement was to the effect the Canada Metal Co. could "clean up" its plant from lead pollution but did not try to. Another dealt with what purported to be unhealthy working conditions at Canada Metals. Still further publicity over the case brought the company back to the doorstep of The Globe and Mail again.

This time it was a page one story The Globe ran Wednesday describing the ex parte injunction.

The story quoted an American environmental expert—whose interview was deleted from the CBC show—saying, as the story put it, "...it was possible for industry to 'buy the data' it wanted 'to substantiate any viewpoint'."

LaMarsh urges a Watergate for Canada

Which is the real Judy LaMarsh...

The Hart House debating committee celebrated its 50th year of operation Thursday night. The debate was on Watergate and the guest speaker was a veteran, though possibly misguided, champion of women's rights, Judy LaMarsh.

The question was on whether Canada should have a Watergate and was won by a vote of 55-47. LaMarsh spoke in the affirmative.

"We are indebted to the US," she said. She went on to explain how a Canadian Watergate would correct the errors of our northern ways.

"The Canadian electorate are not as conditioned as those of the US. Watergate has given us new aspirations," she explained.

Judy LaMarsh is best known as an outspoken minister of health during the Lester Pearson years. She wrote a book on it, "Memoirs of Bird in a Gilded Cage."

She bid a stormy farewell to big-business politics in 1968 during the Liberal party leadership convention.

She handed Lucky Pierre a left-handed salute during the debate: no doubt comparing him to "Dirty-Tricks" Nixon.

"He's left on his own—silent!", she said.

The subject, Watergate, could have been handled in a more serious manner. However, Canadians have John A. Macdonald and Gerda Munzinger to fall back on.

One wit at the debate declared that the spectre of Watergate pales before the spectre of the Canadian Senate. And besides we have a Queen.

In other action the Toronto Blues skated, shot and elbowed their way to an 8-2 victory over the Loyola Warriors.

Job title disputes reflect library workers, dissatisfaction

By MARINA STRAUSS

Students are not alone in their beefs about the university library system.

Many library workers are dissatisfied with working conditions and pay, currently manifested in five workers' complaints that their requests for upgrades in job reclassification were rejected without any explanation.

So claimed Tom Bribiesco, executive committee president of the library union, local 1230, Canadian Union of Public Employees.

"A lot of people in the library are underclassified," Bribiesco contends. "People at the bottom (of job classifications) are doing work above their level and not being recompensed for it."

"The result has been increased work loads, dissatisfaction, and ultimately an effect on services for students," he continued.

In a letter sent Thursday to the university, the five workers request a meeting "to discuss the situation more fully."

The workers write they "have never received adequate and sufficient explanation for (the) refusals."

"Many of us are doing work which seems better described by a higher job classification than the ones we presently have," the letter continued.

"Others of us have had our job:

and responsibilities re-classified though our status and salaries have remained the same."

Bribiesco explained workers are never given the opportunity to "deal directly" with the body of university job analysts which decides on such matters.

However, library personnel head M. J. McCahill, to whom a copy of the letter has been sent, dismissed the workers complaint as "not uncommon."

McCahill felt the workers "don't have a legitimate complaint" but are attempting to get publicity "by devious channels."

He pointed out the workers can file a grievance if they feel they're being treated unjustly, adding that under December's new contract agreement, "beginning next July there will be specific grievance procedure relating to job classification."

"These people are rather impatient," he said.

McCahill denied union contentions that the refusals were due to budget cuts.

One of the workers, Gloria Carr, employed for three years as a "library technician four" at New College, claimed she is not assisting a librarian, as her job duties describe.

"Since September I am completely in charge of the whole operation and in the planning and development of the collection," Carr maintained. Since the new contract came into effect last month, Carr earns $7,981 per year.

Bribiesco considered the most "blatant" case that of Joe Knight, a worker in the rare books section, who has been in the lowest job classification, "library technician two," for the past five years, and earns $6,362 per year.

Knight, who "retrieves and shelves books," said: "People working in other parts of the library and doing the same work are at a higher classification and earning a higher pay."

Art & Sc opens up

For the first time in three years the call is going out for all students to come to the faculty of Arts and Science General Committee to see a debate on staff-student parity on tenure committees.

The meeting is at 4:15 pm on today at the infamous Simcoe Hall council chamber. Also discussed will be restructuring and reviving the honors program. Your best chance to see some of the top faculty troglodytes in action. J. B. Conacher, Dean Greene, David Dooley and a cast of hundreds will star. Admission free. Entertainment guaranteed.

Toros spreading more bull at U of T

So last night was "U of T appreciation night" at Varsity Arena, sponsored by none other than the Toronto Toros, U of T's answer to the Ringling Brothers Circus.

The Toros do, indeed, have some reasons to be appreciative; a chance to play "good hockey" and have "good fun" when Basset's team couldn't get in anywhere else; a lower rate than they would have paid at any other ice palace in town; and, presumably, a ready market on the campus for their product. Ah, the thrill of the game—he shoots, he scores, as Faster Foster would say.

However, the Toros seem to be somewhat misled in their appreciation of the U of T arena, since it is not the university that should be thanked for the use of the ice palace but the students themselves.

The Toros perhaps recognized this in a somewhat backhanded manner by reducing student admission to $3 with ATL card for last night's game. They even set up a "Lady Godiva Memorial Band Reunion" and advertised in The Varsity that "the band will be out in full force including many famous Godiva Old-Timers."

The Toros also sought to suck in the women hockey lovers and girlfriends of the men who get turned on by this "most Canadian of sports," by giving away a fur coat "to some lucky lady".

Well, folks, don't hold your breath. The "appreciation night" may just be advanced promotion and publicity for the fact that it's almost contract signing time again for use of the arena. However, the Toros are reportedly negotiating a deal to use

Maple Leaf Gardens next year, and the "appreciation" display may also be being used as bargaining power with the Gardens, if Basset is indeed telling the Gardens that he is once again negotiating with Simcoe Hall.

The irony of the whole Toros-Simcoe Hall love affair is, of course, the fact that the arena is not, financially, the administration's property to lease out as it sees fit. Granted, the university has all-power over any facilities coming under the purview of the Governing Council. But does that give Council the right to unilaterally lease a facility which other people paid for?

The case seems to be irrefutable; the administration has only issued "no comment" statements when presented with the facts who paid for the arena and stadium. Officially, the University of Toronto Athletic Association "Report on Finances 1970-71 and Estimates 1971-72" revealed that the UTAA had in fact paid construction costs for the stadium and arena (including interest paid to the old Board of Governors for the financing of capital construction) totalling $1,366,904.34 up to 1971, with no subsidies from either the university or any government body.

So the stadium and arena have been repaid through students' athletics fees, and revenues from the rental of the stadium and arena facilities for a variety of purposes including intercollegiate football games and intercollegiate hockey games.

A neat trick if it works—the administration gets students and spectators to pay for the facilities and then decides it controls them. And let's not forget who provides the gate receipts once again, mainly students, up until the last few years, since it's they who put on the shows. For example a report completed a couple of years ago by two fourth year Varsity Blues' football players for a course in physical education noted that during the 1950's the Blues' football team was drawing more crowds than the Toronto Argonauts when they used the stadium.

Community groups have also paid a high price for the arena and stadium. Since the arena is a member of the Ontario Arena Association it charges more expensive rates on weekends than during the week. Unfortunately, most community groups have to use it on weekends.

In fact Simcoe Hall has always seen theatrical facilities on campus as money-making propositions as well as a chance to help the business community instead of the public community of the surrounding area. For example, in the 1971-72 financial year alone, the UTAA increased its revenue through business deals with Prosoccer Limited (September 1971), for the use of Varsity Stadium, Paquin Productions Company Limited (musical series for the summer of 1971), and the North American Drum and Bugle Championships. More recent deals have involved the North American Soccer League and Encore Productions Limited (for the summer of 1973).

And because as true businessmen the profit motive has always come first, the boys and girls in the club at Simcoe Hall have turned down what might be considered reasonable applications for the summer use of facilities by such organizations as a summer football camp for boys and local "ethnic" (as the UTAA minutes report) soccer teams, in favour of large league teams.

Simcoe Halls wants to maintain control of all athletic facilities in its hands. Gus Abols' Internal Affairs committee task force on athletic structures recommends that all facilities by-pass any structure where students might have a say in who uses the arena or stadium.

We approached Marnie Paikin, chairwoman of internal affairs, a couple of weeks ago to ask her if she had seen a letter from a community member involved with the Little Toronto Hockey League which we printed in the paper. She hadn't, so we're reprinting it below from the January 8th Varsity. If the Toros are once again negotiating a contract for the arena after Simcoe Hall (i.e. Jill Conway) has maintained the rental deal was for one year only they can expect to see the shit hit the fan in the fall. From City Hall, community groups, and, for what it's worth, the media.

Two typical Simcoe Hall Toros' hockey fans

The following letter was sent to U of T president John Evans.

I am appealing to you to do something about conditions at Varsity Arena relating to the activities of The Little Toronto Hockey League.

The league has use of the arena from six until 11 pm, Saturday evenings. Well over 400 boys, aged six to 14 play in the various teams and there are long waiting lists of others who would like the same privilege. Unfortunately they cannot be accommodated due to lack of facilities and ice time. This is doubly unfortunate because the majority of these youngsters are from poor homes in the central and downtown areas of Toronto.

For those who can be accommodated conditions are deplorable. Lack of dressing room space means youngsters have to change into hockey gear beside ural troughs in the men's wash room. In some cases mothers are exposed to this as they assist in dressing six years olds.

Some teams do get the use of dressing rooms but the time schedule is so tight it means waiting until a team comes off the ice, gets dressed and leaves, before they can go in. From then until they are due on the ice the time is approximately 10 minutes. Hardly time for a coach to have much contact with his team, which in most cases he sees once a week.

It is important for these volunteer coaches to have time with their boys, not only to prepare them for their games but to give direction in other ways. Many of the youngsters have problems and sometimes it is easier to talk about them with another adult they trust than with a parent.

League officials are under tremendous pressure because of the situation. This was further aggravated not long ago when the arena took away the office assigned the league for many years.

Arena officials left them a space about the size of a skimpy clothes closet where league files are kept. The business of running the league has to be done in the arena hallway.

Not only is the league strapped for space, but time as well. In order to get in all the games in the five hour period and allow for time to flood the ice, each game can only last 28 minutes. Yet these youngsters pay 50 cents admission each time they come.

Admittedly, some families can well afford the 50 cents, but many cannot.

I understand, Dr. Evans, is university policy to assist youngsters in athletics so what can be done to help this league.

Incidentally, this league has been in existence for about as long as Varsity Arena has been standing which I understand is at least 50 years. So, it is not a new relationship by any means.

My reason for writing you, Dr. Evans, is that I am concerned parent. I have two boys who play in the league, one seven and the other 11. Naturally, I want things to be better for them but I am more concerned about the hundreds of youngsters who are less fortunate than mine.

Please. Will you help?

My credo, by Bob Bettson

It is interesting to see that the student involved in the dispute over my attendance at the recent meeting of the academic standards committee has not seen fit to write to The Varsity or speak to me about her concerns.

All this alleged concern, coming from three faculty members, is touching, but what does it really represent?

I find myself split with the other staff members of The Varsity on the question of whether we should leave any meeting just because we are asked to.

Why are these discussions carried on behind closed doors? We must come to the conclusion the faculty has something to hide. After all academic standards has no student members. Why?

I challenge Dean Greene or the other professors who complained about the abrogation of students' rights to resign from this committee because it abrogates students' rights by existing. Then we'll see who is on the students' side.

I never had a chance to speak to the woman concerned. I had to rely on the statements of faculty members who in the past have shown no inclination to defend students' rights.

Who were the people who wanted to prevent students from full use of the Roberts Library? Who wants students excluded from tenure committees? Who wants the new discipline codes?

Let's face it, students have two groups of enemies in the university, the administration and the faculty. Not all the faculty but all those who support the elitist and anti-student policies of the U of T Faculty Association.

While there is a temptation to blame Dr. John and his errand boys at Simcoe Hall for all the anti-student policies at U of T, they could not pass them without support from our "friends" at the faculty association.

Any closed committee without student representation is an insult to students. What business have these faculty members saying students don't have the ability to sit on tenure committees. What arrant nonsense! Students are as able as faculty members to sit on committees.

In fact in 1971 at the U of T Act debate in Queen's Park, it was the students who impressed the legislators. It was the faculty who were unreasonable, ill-informed and immature.

I would urge anyone who has any doubts about this to visit the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science and see how petty and ridiculous many of the faculty members are.

There is a better case for questioning how faculty members are picked to sit on various committees than students.

To conclude I must question the integrity of academics who are so quick to rise to defend a student who they have persuaded to reject the presence of the press.

Next time, when a student who wants the press present appears, it will be interesting to see if they change their tune. It will be another reporter but I hope he or she stays if the student wants him to, no matter what this so-called committee says.

It's time students stopped putting up with this nonsense. Let's open things up starting with the closed meetings. If a meeting is closed it is because the administration does not want to allow students to know what is going on.

It is The Varsity's duty to continue on a selective basis to refuse to listen to these self-interested bureaucrats and faculty members. The university is not one big happy family and though John Evans is a nice guy he doesn't care what students think.

I deny the factual untruths outlined in the letters attacking me. And consider the source before you judge who is telling the truth.

Let me just add that The Varsity has a vested interest, there's no doubt about it. We're a student newspaper and we want a better deal for students. Administrators and faculty don't, so why should we listen to their pious defence of privilege and secrecy.

If I have to end up "in the dog house" to unearth the truth and expose secrecy I will. It is the duty of student journalists to take all the shit they have to defend the students' interests.

As to claims of bias, I admit them. As the managing editor of the Globe said to me last week: "You lost your objectivity the day you left the womb."

If some people criticize The Varsity it is because it makes them uncomfortable. Well too bad. The Varsity will continue to do what it thinks is best without interference by self-interested faculty members.

I apologize to the staff for overstepping policy but in the future I will propose to the staff that we endorse a policy of not meekly bowing to the interests of a small minority.

Boycotts serve to obscure reality

Refusal of the students at Vic to boycott grapes does not essentially constitute a reactionary position vis-à-vis the Chavez farm workers. True enough, boycotts of various products and companies (e.g. Kraft, Dare, grapes, etc.) are justified by the oppressive working conditions that cause the boycott.

Yet product boycotts serve to obscure the reality. All workers are oppressed and exploited by the economic system—capitalism. The destruction of that system, not a reformist or chic boycott of certain products is the crux of the matter.

Grape boycott not radical

How beautifully Mr. Foulkes puts it! The presence of "many interested and socially conscious groups on this campus" is apparently something that he has observed. His observing them, however, does not seem to lead him either to active opposition or active support; all that happens is that "their presence is felt and noted" — and presumably their presence thereby saves his conscience about students here being "apathetic and callous". (His words, not ours.) We are grateful that he has sown the activism to write a letter to you — although, of course, it does not commit him to a point of view either Pro or Con the grape boycott, which was a central issue in our letter.

What he cannot escape from is that the men's residence at Victoria decided not to support the grape boycott. We have strong grounds for belief that the poll was inadequately undertaken by the elected student representatives, which would seem to indicate that student self-government is not functioning properly within the residence. As does it is one of our tasks to encourage student self-government, and from the response that we have already had from within the residence to our letter, there are some grounds for hope that our action has stimulated people to examine how they are represented and to realize that self-government involves such tedious and time consuming tasks as determining people's views and wishes—and acting upon them.

But we have a horrible suspicion that the result of the poll, nevertheless, was an accurate representation of student views here. This we can only deplore. Amongst some the grape boycott has acquired a "radical" tinge, and there is a great fear among many here that they might be thought of as something other than (small c) conservative. Hence our reference to the United and Catholic Churches and Mayor Crombie. (There was no mention of the Pope.) Our reference to such was in order to reassure any conservative that support for the boycott would not imply that he was supporting a call for any radical change or break-down in the established social order. Apparently Mr. Foulkes was unable to comprehend this.

We are loathe to don the guise of scourgings of VUSAC, but must also observe, in reply to Mr. Foulkes, that it would have been wiser for any VUSAC executive member so concerned, to have consulted the dietitian, or listened to the advice of the don, rather than allow himself to be "assured that the grapes weren't Californian" by another member of his own executive.

No, we do not need or want Mr. Foulkes's commiseration. But the Californian grape workers do.

Varsity ads bolster sexism

I have been most pleased with the stands you have taken on racism, imperialism and student rights. Is sexism only a minor concern? Specifically, what are you doing with that advert you have run recently addressed to students "tired of bullshit employment," and offering women jobs as cocktail waitresses, but only men the responsibility of cooking and serving those precious pieces of meat and lobster? If such solicitations are still legal, must the Varsity participate?

—A "SIMULATION GAME" FOR STUDYING TANZANIA

International Student Centre
33 St. George Street
Tuesday evening February 5, 7:00 p.m.
Thursday afternoon February 7, 2:00 p.m.

February 1 to 10 has been declared "Ten Days for World Development" by the relief and development agencies of Canadian churches. During these ten days local groups across the country, be it in classrooms, social centres, or church halls, will focus on the problems of the developing world, a struggle which excludes no country.

Africa has been given a particular focus. A game "Afrik" was designed for the Vancouver committee of "Ten Days for World Development". This game or technique helps introduce Tanzania's development policies to a group of people relatively uninformed about Tanzania. The group is presented with a hypothetical island nation at the time of independence. The members of the group are then asked to pretend that they are the nation's leaders and to set guidelines for the nation's development. The characteristics of the hypothetical nation are similar to Tanzania's. A ready comparison can then be made between what policies the group has set and Tanzania's policies.

"Afrik" will be played at the International Student Centre twice during the ten days - Tuesday evening, February 5, 7:00 p.m. and Thursday afternoon, February 7, at 2:00 p.m. Everyone is welcome to participate in the game. Several groups can be formed if there are many people. It could prove to be a most intensive experience, as well as an opportunity to achieve a greater appreciation of development issues.

In Quebec it's James Bay, In Mozambique it's Cabora Bassa In Paraguay it's ITAIPU

TRANSLATED FROM BULLETIN POPULAIRE

Indians, Eskimos and progressive groups in Quebec are opposed to the harnessing of the James Bay region for hydro-electric power. In Mozambique, patriots, under the leadership of FRELIMO, continue to fight against the completion of construction of the Cabora Bassa dam. And in Latin America, the most important hydro-electric project of them all has begun; it's the Itaipu dam on the Parana River in Paraguay. However, this project is also bringing about strong resistance from the affected peoples.

In each instance it's foreign capitalist interests that are financing the construction of these imposing dams; and in each case the hydro-electric power is destined, for the most part to be transmitted outside the countries of origin. Itaipu's power is meant for Brazil, Cabora Bassa's for South Africa and Rhodesia, and James Bay's for the United States. In each case the dominated peoples take a back seat to the imperialist interests.

The links between the three dams

Itaipu, Cabora Bassa, and James Bay are not branches of the same transmission lines; the three projects are linked instead by American imperialism and by world-wide capitalism.

Propped up by foreign capital, the Brazilian regime has undertaken over the past few years, a large investment campaign in Latin America. From its political policy of an "open door" to investors, Brazil has become the ideal foothold for imperialism, at the same time as it plays the role of "policeman" for that part of the world.

In Africa, Cabora Bassa symbolizes South Africa's apartheid policy and the colonialism of Portugal. Harry Oppenheimer is heavily involved in the project which involves several financiers. Oppenheimer, the king of the diamond mines, enjoys dual South African and Israeli nationality, and is also a director of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (along with U of T's own Sidney Hermant). And, at the sides of the Portuguese are the South African and Rhodesian troops who help to defend the construction of the dam against the attacks of FRELIMO.

Participation by the largest financial houses in the world is also found in James Bay: the Morgan Group, Hanna Mining, the Rockefellers and the Rothchilds are all involved. And the link holding all these interests together is Stephen Bechtel Jr.

In all of the above-mentioned examples, the struggle goes on between the capitalists vying for monopoly control of the energy resources everywhere in the world.

The diversion of kilowatts

Electrical energy is becoming more and more an export product that's very much in demand. The real manipulation of a diversion of kilowatts is co-ordinated, as if by habit, by the imperialist corporations and governments. Paraguay stands out as a ready-made bad example of this effort, having recently signed the Treaty of Itaipu. In the same manner as the other dams, the Treaty calls for the diversion of the Parana River.

Itaipu is located in the heart of the vast basin of the Rio de la Plata. The main rivers of the area — the Parana, the Paraguay, the Uruguay, and the La Plata and their tributaries — furnish the economy of that part of the South American continent with almost 10,000 miles of navigable waterways. These rivers also comprise the only exit to the sea for Bolivia and Paraguay, as well as for some important regions of Brazil and Argentina.

Utilized to the maximum, the hydro-electric potential of these rivers could attain 100 million kilowatts. And, more than electricity, the basin holds immense natural resources: iron and gas in Bolivia, the forest reserves in Paraguay and Mato Grosso in Brazil, and the humid pampa of Argentina, useful for the cultivation of wheat.

Because of Brazil's political policy of aggressive imperialism, the kilowatts from Itaipu will serve to supply the foreign industries set up in southern Brazil with cheap energy.

A type of "silent fascism"

A small population of 2.4 million realizes that, today more than ever, it must struggle against the unilateral and reactionary decisions of the oldest dictator in Latin America. The people of Paraguay, without a doubt the most impoverished people in South America, are, at the same time, those who will have to stand up to the most numerous, most powerful, and most united enemies to liberate themselves.

These enemies include: the fascist and unconditionally pro-Brazilian regime of General Alfred Stroessner, the arch-reactionary agricultural and commercial bourgeoisie of Asuncion (the capital city of Paraguay), the financiers, and the Brazilian military and American imperialists.

In his palace, dictator Stroessner never stops smiling; a smile here and a smile there, business is going smoothly. His generals, and even his own son, work relentlessly to push railway lines through the country with the help of the "international mafia."

And while this is going on 300 political prisoners rot in jail. Paraguay in 1974 is the same country as the Paraguay of 1954, when Alfred Stroessner seized power in a coup d'etat. The dictator now controls the political apparatus, the military and the judiciary. He has governed throughout the years under a virtual state of siege, which he only lifts for 24 hours on election day. So it's not surprising that he was re-elected for a fifteenth consecutive term to the presidency in February, 1973.

Last August 15th, two days after the ratification of the Treaty of Itaipu, celebrations were organized in the capital city of Paraguay, Asuncion, to celebrate the start of Stroessner's fifteenth mandate. As was expected, Brazil's minister of external affairs, Mario Gibson Bardeza attended as well as the special envoy of Richard Nixon, Democratic senator J. Bennett Johnston. Johnston's visit was designed to convey Nixon's best wishes to Stroessner — best wishes from Nixon, the war criminal and political crook, who's also president of the United States.

And Nixon recently described the Paraguayan regime as an "ideal government for Latin Americans." For Washington, an ideal government is a government, which, in 20 short years, has succeeded in creating catastrophic economic and social conditions: 30 per cent illiteracy, 70 per cent of the people live in slums, 500,000 are unemployed (out of a total population of 2.4 million), there are a half-million exiles, 300 patriots have been tortured and assassinated since 1954, political prisoners have been detained incommunicado and tortured since 1958 without any precise accusations or any "due process" of any kind, frequent mass strikes are forbidden, the siege has existed for decades, and the total submission to the Americans of the Brazilians.

The Brazil-Paraguay

Gibson Bardeza's goal: to cement the friendship between Asuncion and the infamous Treaty of Itaipu.

On April 26, 1974, the two countries agreed to build a dam on the Parana River, a frontier between the two countries, the distance of approximately 100 miles. The dam, in effect, the occupied by the Brazilian, after a war of extension of Paraguay.

At the time of the decision, the frontier between the two countries, in 1965, the area had been a Brazilian battalion around Guaira Falls, build a dam. Itaipu: on the Parana River, in Paraguay. Work has just begun on the project and the first output of power is expected in 1980. With a production capacity of 11 million kilowatts and at a cost of $2.5 billion, Itaipu is the largest economic project in South America.

Cabora Bassa: on the Zambezi River, in Mozambique, 60 miles from the Rhodesian frontier. Work on the project has been in progress since 1970 and the production of about four million kilowatts will begin in 1975. The main wall of the dam will be 550 feet high and 1,000 feet long. The dam is planned as one aspect of the base of a future economic system enveloping all the countries dominated by the white, southern Africans. FRELIMO has already destroyed 75 per cent of the means of communication thereby hindering transportation of the necessary material to the work site.

According to two American military officers, military aid from the United States to Paraguay will intensify during the next few months. When the major military ships of the US visited Paraguay, Admiral Robert Blount, chief of the United States southern naval command, talked of the 'friendship' that existed between the American and Paraguayan governments and assured the country that relations between the military institutions of the two countries would be the next aspect of the relationship to be strengthened.

'Class struggle' surfaces in Don Vale area

By PAUL McGRATH
According to Ward 7 alderman John Sewell, there is a bit of a class struggle going on in the Don Vale area of Toronto, an economically mixed section bounded by Bloor and Gerrard Streets on the north and south, and Parliament street and the Don River on the west and east.

The topic which has raised much anger in the area in the past few months, surrounds the proposal to build non-profit housing for low-income families in the middle of the ward on Carlton Street.

The struggle between the supporters and opponents of the proposal, put forward by Don Area Co-op Homes Inc. (DACHI), is taking place in an area which used to be almost totally working-class and until 1970 was slated for redevelopment on the St. James Town level.

Since then, renovations on housing in the area and a subsequent rise in prices (from an average of $20,000 to $65,000 is one estimate) have pushed lower-income families out, replacing them by with more well-to-do folk.

Sewell sees the newer wealthier residents as the chief opponents to the scheme, saying their opposition is from "young professionals in the area who don't want working-class people living next to them."

Charge against officer dropped by Dan Heap

By TIM GALLAGHER
Ward 6 alderman Dan Heap, arrested for obstruction and common assault October 15 dropped a charge of common assault against day.

Heap commented after dropping the charge Friday: "I have no quarrel with the police."

This action came after the constable involved completed the Crown evidence against Heap.

Heap's trial, currently under way, was adjourned to February 11.

During the strike, Heap was critical of police conduct at the Artistic picket line, saying he witnessed "what amounts to assault by police" on pickets.

Heap was also one of several city aldermen who urged Metro council to vote against the proposed pay increase Metro police were demanding last year.

Heap based his stand on police actions during the Artistic strike.

Basketball Blues drop York Yeomen 84-73

Three Blues (in white) wait for rebound against York.

By JON FRIED

The basketball Blues strengthened their hold on first place and extended their unbeaten string to 10 games by defeating the York Yeomen 84-73 Saturday at the Benson Building.

The Yeomen's loss dropped their record to 6-6 and left their chances for a playoff spot in the O.U.A.A. Eastern Division in doubt. The Blues, after losing their first game, now stand at 10-1.

In Saturday's action, the Blues jumped to a quick 8-2 lead and never had less than a six point margin in the contest. The Yeomen started the final 20 minutes aggressively, closing the first half 41-29 gap to six points but their inability to control the boards put the game out of reach.

Blues coach John McManus used his team's height advantage to its fullest, starting 6'7" Frank Cress, 3'6" Bryan Skyvington, and 6'6" Glenn Scott at the forwards, with explosive rookie Doug Fox and stalwart Randy Filinski at the guards.

Their first half fastbreak ball handling become sloppy mid-way through the period, and coach McManus made wholesale substitutions, but was unable to find another suitable combination. Fox (14), Skyvington (8), and Filinski (6) combined for 28 points in the first half, as Blues shot 48 per cent from the floor.

In the second half, Doug Fox got into foul trouble early, and finished with 18 points. With ball-hawking Fox on the bench, Edward Spence of the Yeoman accumulated 17 points, all coming in the final 20 minutes.

Mike Betcherman had 14 for York before fouling out, and Yeoman were left without an adequate big man for the necessary press in the closing minutes. Frank Cress fouled out for the Blues with only three points to his credit.

With the help of Rick Kurczyk's positional play at the high post, though, the Blues were able to break the Yeomen press in the final moments and maintain their margin of victory.

Randy Filinski led all scorers with 21, and captain Bryan Skyvington finished with 19. Glen Scott notched 13 for Varsity. Other Blues' scorers were Kurczyk with four, and Birnbaum and Rudnik with two a piece.

For the Yeomen, Vince Santoro had 15, Jeff Simbrow got nine, Romeo Callegaro and Brian Silverstein grabbed six a piece, and Sam Brutto nailed four points coming off the bench.

Women gymnasts do well on weekend

An invitational gymnastics meet at McMaster on Saturday saw the U of T women's team compete against teams from York, McMaster and Western.

Of the four universities at the competition, York came away with top honours. Because team standing is based on total points over the four events, Varsity, with an incomplete entry, was not in contention for team placement. But as expected excellence on the individual level captured seven out of 10 possible placements.

In the intermediate senior division, Janice Greenwood took first place both on the uneven parallel bars and in floor exercise with scores of 8.3 and 8.13. Greenwood tied for a further first in vaulting with a score of 8.7.

Helene Eisenburg claimed a second place finish with her 8.5 beam routine, while Pam McCleod's performances on bars, beam and vault gained her placements of second, third and fourth, respectively.

7.3, added another first place finish to U of T's tally, while Bette Fukusaka finished third on beam with 7.5.

The McMaster Invitational was the second meet of the season. In an earlier dual meet at Western, the Toronto team placed first overall.

With minor injuries now behind them and two more weeks of hard training ahead, Toronto's gymnasts have high hopes for an even better showing at the championship meet February 16 at Western.

Blues scalp Loyola Warriors 8 - 2

By DAVID COOK

Two of the top-ranked college hockey teams in the east met head on Friday in exhibition play at Varsity Arena. When the final buzzer sounded, the Toronto Blitzkrieg had shell-the visiting Loyola Warriors 8-2. The Blues thus revenge their previous 3-2 loss to Loyola in Montreal over the Christmas holidays.

A fired-up Toronto squad and key injuries to Loyola's leading scorers were responsible for the lopsided tally.

Proceedings were delayed while Loyola had problems getting their skates sharpened. The warm-up afforded spectators the unique opportunity to watch Warrior netminder Dan Fournier perform his trampoline stunts that indicated that Varsity had their work cut out for them.

The first period began with lots of action that gradually cooled off as both teams changed to a more cautious style.

The Warriors came on strong for the first two minutes with their only forerunning effort of the game. They convincingly tested Robert Oss in the Toronto net on several occasions, especially when Brent Swanick was off for elbowing.

Suddenly the Warriors appeared to be auditioning for parts in a sequel to the "Night of the Living Dead." They performed like zombies on the ice for the rest of the period which ended 2-0 for the Blues.

Fortunately Fournier wasn't afflicted in the nets, kicking out all but two of the twenty shot barrage that he faced in the period.

Loyola retreated in the face of the tireless checking and skating assault launched by the Fifield line that was sustained by the fresh reinforcements of the other Blues' lines.

The Warriors weren't skating with the Blues, which made their forechecking ineffective. Loyola committed the tactical error of allowing the Blues to set up in their own end, hoping that they could pick up the elusive Blues' forwards at centre ice.

Some erratic shooting by Toronto combined with excellent goaltending by Fournier kept the score low in the first period.

Toronto got on the scoresheet at the fifteen minute mark on an excellent power-play goal by Ron Harris. A pass from Doug Herridge set Harris up perfectly and then three minutes later Herridge connected again for another goal on a bloop that caromed off Fournier's shoulder.

Runkhe scored the first of his three goals of the night only two minutes into the second period, making the score 3-0.

Loyola, stormed back less than a minute later as Grant Bennett scored Loyola's first goal. He took an excellent pass from behind the net by Doug Grills and put the puck past Oss.

Toronto continued to throw their weight around and a series of penalties were assessed to both clubs although Toronto was successful in intimidating the lacklustre Warriors.

Runkhe finished off the scoring in the second period with his second goal. He scored on a quick wrist shot after being set up perfectly by Larry Hopkins' good fake that fooled his check.

Runkhe again opened the scoring in the third period with his twenty-third goal of the season. Don Pagnutti set him up in front of the net, drawing Fournier as Runkhe hit the opposite corner. Other Toronto goal-scorers in the period were Gord Davies, Larry Hopkins and Bill Fifield.

Loyola notched their second goal at the fifteen minute mark from Mike Culletton after Oss failed to cover up on a rolling puck in the crease. Oss had just 18 shots directed at him during the game by Loyola while the Blues fired 38 shots at Fournier.

Fencers compete

By WING NIP

Last weekend, University of Toronto hosted the OUA A fencing quarter-finals in Hart House.

In team competitions, York captured first place and U of T second place in all three weapons. Ryerson came third in foil.

Since two teams from each weapon promote to the next round, York and U of T will both appear in full force in the semi-finals.

In individual competition, Abu Nazin of U of T was first in foil. He and two other foil fencers from York will go to the semi-finals.

Other U of T foil team members, Benard Tsui and Tong Chong, finished fourth and fifth in a field of eight.

The U of T epee team of John Roth (undefeated), Dave Hamer and Wing Nip revenge their team defeat by finishing first, second and third in a field of eight and will proceed to the semi-finals.

Andy Belyer, from U of T, finished third in sabre and will be Toronto's lone representative in the semi-final of individual sabre.

Robert Vigod and Tom Ladanyi of U of T finished fourth and sixth respectively. This event was won by York's Gray Sterling.

Swimmers win and lose over the weekend

By PAUL CARSON

There are two ways to win a swim meet—talent and bench strength. The men's swimming team experienced both the joy and sorrow that comes when you have it and when you don't as Varsity drubbed Alfred Tech 78-35 Friday night before bowing to Michigan by the identical score yesterday afternoon in the Benson Building pool.

Varsity captain Jim Adams set two pool records Friday night but they lasted less than twenty-four hours as no less than seven standards fell during Sunday's three events.

When the last watch had been put away, Adams had successively lowered the record for the 100-yard freestyle to 47.4 seconds from the former 47.9 set last year.

Blues won only four events yesterday against seventh-ranked Michigan and Adams participated in three of them, winning the 100 free, lowering his own pool record in the 50 free by four-tenths of a second to 21.6, and contributing a fast butterfly leg as Blues took the 400-yard medley relay in another record time, 3:44.3, a narrow two-tenths better than the 1973 team could produce.

Freshman diver Fin Temple gained Blues final victory yesterday with an exciting upset in the three metre diving. Temple recorded two 8.0 and another two 7.5 marks from the judges to in one difficult dive edge Michigan's Kirk Donaldson 240.25 to 233.35.

Temple also won the three-metre diving Friday night in another come-from-behind effort as he edged Alfred Tech co-captain Allan Davis by 11 points.

Greg Vanular, another promising Varsity rookie, turned in the most optimistic result of Friday's meet as he won the 200-yard backstroke in 2:07 flat, the third fastest backstroke time ever recorded by a Toronto swimmer. And, as a happy coach Robin Campbell hastened to point out, he's only a freshman.

Alfred Tech, US national junior college champions since 1971, learned what happens when a team with some good young talent is pitted against an older team of experienced veterans.

Campbell appeared to have miscalculated as the Americans won the opening relay and later swept the one-metre diving to trail only 30-22 after six events. But the visitors were handicapped by their two-year eligibility rule and the Alfred Tech freshmen and sophomores simply were outmatched by Varsity veterans like Adams, Mike Guinness, John Sebben and Dave Wilkin.

Adams wasn't even pushed in his two record-setting races and Guinness showed signs of regaining his old form in handily winning the 1000 and 500-yard freestyles.

Returned from a year at Indiana, Guinness is expected to fill the gap in Blues lineup created when sophomore Shawn Laari was sidelined with painful tendonitis. Both are distance freestyle specialists, and Guinness was the CIAU champion in the 1650 in 1972 and Laari won the same event last year.

Alfred Tech kept the meet close for a while and things might have been even tighter had a few placing judges' decisions gone their way.

However, Wilkin took a close win in the 50-yard freestyle in 23.3 seconds, Jay Steele won the 200-yard butterfly in a relatively slow 2:08.6 and John Sebben made the rout official with a crushing 200-yard breaststroke in 2:20.7.

Temple and Alex Lau gained a first and third in the diving and Campbell rubbed it in as Blues won the concluding 400-yard freestyle relay over a willing but exhausted Alfred Tech entry.

Yesterday, however, the shoe was on the proverbial other foot as the all-scholarship Michigan swimmers had too much of everything, depth as well as talent.

Blues started strong as Vanular, Sebben, Adams and Wilkin took the opening relay, and two races later Adams was back to swim the record-breaking 50 free.

Varsity trailed by only 20-14 after four events but then the Michigan talent and depth took over and Blues grabbed only two firsts and two seconds in the remaining nine events.

Coach Gus Stager tried to play the good-guest game by dropping the final relay to make the score more respectable but Blues' premier freestylers had already completed their allotted events so the visitors won the 400-free relay in what was for them a slow 3:23.3, over two seconds off the pool record.

In addition to providing the 150 spectators with an excellent display of high-quality intercollegiate swimming, Michigan left with four pool records: Dan Fishburn in the 1000-yard freestyle (10:05.6), Norm Semchysen in the 200-yard freestyle (1:47.9), Rob Helt in the 200-yard backstroke (2:01.7) and Stu Isaac in the 200-yard breaststroke (2:13.2).

As Snoopy once remarked, it's always a pleasure to witness the difference between the gifted amateur and the real professional. Friday, it was Alfred Tech's turn to experience the sensation of being systematically worn down, Sunday the Blues took their expected lumps, and next weekend Michigan is cannon-fodder to the awesome Indiana swimming machine.

Blues travel to Guelph on Saturday for a meaningless afternoon of warmup exercises against the over-matched Gryphons. After that, it's tapering down for the final push aimed at the OUA championships in Sudbury later in the month.

Yvonne: Where were you last night?
Rick: (his back is to her) That's so long ago, I don't remember.
Yvonne: Will I see you tonight?
Rick: (matter-of-factly) I never make plans that far ahead.

Renault: We are very honored tonight, Rick. Major Strasser is one of the reasons the Third Reich enjoys the reputation it has today.
Strasser: (smiling) You repeat "Third Reich" as though you expected there to be others.
Renault: Well, personally, Major I will take what comes.
Strasser: (to Rick) Do you mind if I ask you a few questions?
Unofficially, of course.
Rick: Make it official, if you like.
Strasser: What is your nationality?
Rick: (pokerface) I'm a drunkard.
Renault: That makes Rick a citizen of the world.

Ilsa: Where is Rick?
Sam: (evading) I don't know. I ain't seen him all night.
(Sam looks very uncomfortable.)
Ilsa: When will he be back?
Sam: Not tonight no more. He ain't coming. He went home.
Ilsa: Does he always leave so early?
Sam: Oh, he never... well...
(desperately) He's got a girl up at the Blue Parrot. He goes up there all the time.
Ilsa: You used to be a much better liar Sam.
Sam: Leave him alone Miss Ilsa. You're bad luck to him.
Ilsa: (softly) Play it once, Sam, for old time's sake.
Sam: I don't know what you mean, Miss Ilsa.
Ilsa: Play it, Sam. Play "As Time Goes By."
Sam: I can't remember it, Miss Ilsa, I'm a little rusty on it.
Ilsa: I'll hum it for you.
(starts to hum) He begins to play it very softly Ilsa: Sing it, Sam.
(And Sam sings.)
Sam: "You must remember this, a kiss is just a kiss, a sigh is just a sigh, etc."

Rick: What's that you're playing?
Sam: (who has been improvising) Just a little something of my own.

Rick: Well, stop it. You know what I want to hear.
Sam: No, I don't
Rick: You played it for her and you can play it for me.
Sam: Well, I don't think I can remember it for me.
Rick: If she can stand it, I can. Play it!
Sam: Yes, boss.
(Sam starts to play "As Time Goes By")
Ilsa: (sadly) It's the Gestapo. They say they expect to be in Paris tomorrow. They are telling us how to act when they come marching in.
(smiling faintly)
With the whole world crumbling we pick this time to fall in love.
Rick: Yeah, it's pretty bad timing.

Rick: (a thought strikes him) Say, why don't we get married in Marseilles?
Ilsa: (evasively) That's too far ahead to plan.
Rick: (happy, excited at the thought of leaving with Ilsa) Yes, I guess it is a little too far ahead. Well, let's see. What about the engineer? Why can't he marry us on the train?

Rick: Why did you come to Casablanca? There are other places.
Ilsa: I wouldn't have come if I had known that you were here. Believe me, Rick, it's true, I don't know.
Rick: It's funny about your voice, how it hasn't changed. I can still hear it "Richard dear, I'll go with you anywhere. We'll get on a train together and never stop."
Ilsa: Please don't. Don't, Rick! I can understand how you feel.
Rick: Huh! You understand how I feel. How long was it we had, honey?
Ilsa: I didn't count the days.
Rick: Well, I did. Every one of them. Mostly I remember the last one. A wow finish. A guy standing on a station platform in the rain with a comical look on his face, because his insides had been kicked out. (He takes a drink)

Rick: (to the German) I don't like disturbances in my place. Either lay off politics or get out

Strasser: (eyes him closely) Captain Renault, are you entirely certain which side you're on?

Renault: I have no conviction, if that's what you mean. I blow with the wind, and the prevailing wind happens to be from Vichy.
Strasser: And if it should change?
Renault: (smiles) Surely the Reich doesn't admit that possibility?

Rick: I'm not interested in politics. The problems of the world are not in my department. I'm a saloon keeper.
Laszlo: My friends in the underground tell me that you have quite a record. You ran guns to Ethiopia. You fought against the fascists in Spain.
Rick: What of it?
Laszlo: Isn't it strange that you always happened to be fighting on the side of the underdog?
Rick: Yes. I found that a very expensive hobby, too. But then I never was much of a businessman.

Laszlo: (quietly) Ilsa, I...
Ilsa: Yes? (A pause).
Laszlo: When I was in the concentration camp, were you lonely in Paris?
(Their faces are barely visible in the darkness.)
Ilsa: Yes, Victor, I was.
Laszlo: (sympathetically) I know how it is to be lonely. (Very quietly)
Is there anything you wish to tell me?
Ilsa: (she controls herself, speaking low) No, Victor, there isn't. (there is silence.)
Laszlo: I love you very much, my dear.
Ilsa: (barely able to speak) Yes. Yes, I know. Victor, whatever I do, will you believe that I, that...
Laszlo: You don't even have to say it. I'll believe.
(Bending down, he kisses her cheek.)

Ilsa: I know how you feel about me, but I'm asking you to put your feelings aside for something more important.
Rick: Do I have to hear again what a great man your husband is? What an important cause he's fighting for?
Ilsa: It was your cause too. In your own way, you were fighting for the same thing.
Rick: I'm not fighting for anything anymore, except myself. I'm the only cause I'm interested in.

Ilsa: I can't fight it anymore. I ran away from you once. I can't do it again. Oh, I don't know what's right any longer. You'll have to think for both of us, for all of us.
Rick: All right, I will. Here's looking at you, kid.
Ilsa: I wish I didn't love you so much.

Rick: Don't you sometimes wonder if it's worth all this? I mean what you're fighting for?
Laszlo: We might as well question why we breathe. If we stop breathing, we'll die. If we stop fighting our enemies, the world will die.
Rick: What of it? Then it'll be out of its misery.
Laszlo: You know how you sound, M'sieur Blaine? Like a man who's trying to convince himself of something he doesn't believe in this heart. Each of us has a destiny, for good or for evil.
Rick: (dryly) Yes, I get the point.
Laszlo: I wonder if you do. I wonder if you know that you're trying to escape from yourself and that you'll never succeed.

Ilsa: But what about us?
Rick: We'll always have Paris. We didn't have it, we'd lost it, until you came to Casablanca. We got it back last night.
Ilsa: And I said I would never leave you!
Rick: And you never will. But I've got a job to do, too. Where I'm going you can't follow. What I've got to do you can't be any part of. Ilsa, I'm no good at being noble, but it doesn't take much to see that the problems of three little people don't amount to a hill of beans in this crazy world. Someday you'll understand that. Not now. Here's looking at you, kid.

(Rick and Renault watch the plane take off, maintaining their gaze until it disappears into the clouds.)
Renault: It might be a good idea for you to disappear from Casablanca for a while. There's a Free French garrison over at Brazzaville. I could be induced to arrange a passage.
Rick: (smiles) My letter of transit? I could use a trip. But it doesn't make any difference about our bet. You still owe me ten thousand francs.

Teaching assistants at Vic may be first to unionize

By DICK BROWN

The Graduate Assistant's Association (GAA) applied for certification Monday to negotiate as bargaining agent for about 60 teaching assistants (TAs) at Victoria University.

If successful, the certification will make the Vic unit the first TAs in Canada to unionize.

"Our support at Victoria was so strong that we decided to give our members there the security of legal recognition as quickly as possible," said GAA president Michael O'Keefe.

"We hope the precedents set in this (Vic) case at the labor relations board will ease the certification of our larger, main campus bargaining unit."

While provincial labor laws require 35 per cent of the workers to be signed up, in the case of Vic, O'Keefe said, more than half had signed up.

He said the GAA has applied for what is called a "pre-hearing vote" with the Vic unit. Such a vote, if allowed by the labor board, could occur in three weeks.

The ballot boxes would then be sealed until after the labor relations board hearing into the Vic application by the GAA.

If more than 50 per cent vote in favor of the GAA and the board approves the certification, then the GAA is the official union.

The hearing on the Vic application will be a key test for the GAA's drive on the main campus.

O'Keefe said he expects the hearing to settle part of the classification problem which so far has been the stickiest issue in the main campus drive.

O'Keefe says depending on which classifications of workers one chooses the number of TAs at U of T could range from 1,800 to 2,400.

The GAA is currently launching a drive to sign up those assistants, demonstrators and markers missed in their earlier organizing efforts. Sign-up tables are to be in the Robarts Library, Sid Smith and elsewhere Thursday and Friday.

O'Keefe said he hopes the final push to get the certification application in for the main campus will be completed shortly.

The Vic application, he said, should add momentum to the GAA drive.

The separate application for Vic, O'Keefe said, was because of the federated university's independence from the central U of T administration.

Committee designs 'models' for student tenure say

By MARILYN EMERSON

A proposal to design six or seven "models" for selecting students to tenure committees was approved Monday night by academic affairs' subcommittee to recommend methods of selection of students for possible participation on tenure committees.

Definition of those models is to be decided upon by members of the subcommittee and submitted to the academic affairs committee by February 19.

Prompted by students concerned about staffing issues, academic affairs first proposed formation of such a subcommittee in November.

It was approved by Governing Council in December, and first met in January.

In its section, Criteria and Procedures for Granting Tenured Appointments, the Forster Report appears to object, not in principle, but in practice to having student representatives on tenure committees.

"The majority of the committee expressed serious doubts about whether satisfactory selection procedures for student members on tenure committees could be developed and made applicable across the university," the Forster report said.

The purpose of the newly-formed subcommittee is to come up with mechanisms by which students might be selected for participation on tenure committees.

Members of the subcommittee are confronted with such issues as: course and experience requirements of possible student representatives; what kind of students are to be selected, by whom, by what process, from among what group(s) and for what purpose.

The subcommittee asks what kind of student is adequate for the task and what criteria will he or she use to assess candidates for tenure.

Prior to meetings of the subcommittee, suggestions for selection of students to tenure committees were invited by chairwoman, M.A. Barten. Members of the subcommittee are considering those suggestions in formulating their report.

SAC feels the subcommittee "must propose a model for all staffing decisions, not just tenure decisions. They submit a model they feel ought to be adopted as the preferred model."

The Association For Part-Time Undergraduate Students (APUS) feels "the mechanism for selection of students for participation on tenure committees should be left in the hands of the student bodies concerned."

APUS recommends selection of students to sit on tenure committees should be the prerogative of APUS rather than of the university administration.

APUS suggests course evaluations be used to aid assessment of candidates. APUS would want their candidates to have a minimum of three courses in the area under discussion and be at least second year students.

Byron E. Wall, a graduate student member of the Forster task force, states tenure decisions "should be left in the hands of the students."

Wall feels: "The admission of students to tenure committees should be introduced gradually." He favors graduate students for the job.

G.R. Williams, also a member of the Forster task force, states: "I am convinced we should start with graduate student representation, with a view to 'gradual extension of franchise'."

Don B. Alton, executive coordinator of the Faculty of Education student union, says: "We feel that the method of selection should be left to the local student government."

Every Tuesday, Moe and the boys get together and shoot a little academic affairs over at Simcoe Hall. Afterwards, it's a tall glass of hemlock.

Academic affairs committee: loose lips sink ship

Governing Council's academic affairs committee met yesterday, ostensibly to wade further through the recommendations of the Forster task force report on academic appointments.

After a lengthy discussion on the intricacies of scheduling opening fall classes and examinations around Rosh Hashanah and Passover—considering that such breaks are included for the traditional Christian holidays—the committee turned its attentions to comments on parts of the report which had been passed in principle earlier by the same committee.

Comments were received from Erindale Dean E.A. Robinson on the different treatment of Erindale College when it came to Erindale's right to be included in tenure and appointment proceedings.

Committee chairman John Dove's written comment was that the different treatment reflected "present constitutional differences," but an amendment to the report clearly suggested all concerned in the appointment or cross-appointment should be given all relevant information concerning the matter.

Although the amendment states that final choice in the selection of staff should concern any principal or dean of the faculties or divisions concerned, and opinion from Cassels Brock, U of T solicitors, warned that ability to conclude a contract rests only with the university.

Further discussion surrounded the status of a lecturer on the campus, a position which no one on the committee could simply describe.

A large difference of opinion arose over a part of the report which states: "A member of the teaching staff appointed as lecturer should not be permitted to serve more than six years, including a terminal year at the lecturer rank."

The difference arose over two types of lecturers, those who were working towards a PhD and an appointment as assistant professor and those who were what the committee termed "career lecturers."

Associate dean of medicine J.W. Steiner felt the wording as such would jeopardize a portion of his staff who have been career lecturers for longer than six years.

An amendment was passed to assure the six-year limit does not apply to those hired before 1974.

Islanders closer to eviction while yacht clubs may expand

By TOM GRAND

With no help from their own alderman Bill Archer, Toronto Island residents are a step closer to losing their homes while the island yacht clubs continue with their preferred island status.

Last Thursday the Metro parks and recreation committee recommended the Tommy Thompson Report on the future of the development of Toronto Islands be adopted in full and sent on to council.

Adoption of the Metro parks commissioner's report would move Metro one step further towards the eviction of the Toronto Island residents from their homes.

It also means that the Queen's City Yacht Club—one of the three Toronto Island yacht clubs which all together take up 33 acres of land compared to the 29 acres occupied by the island residents—is one step closer to realizing the proposed expansion of its existing facilities.

Wilma Bury, a representative of TIRA—Toronto Island Residents Association—feels Metro's favorable treatment of the yacht clubs amounts to serving the wishes of a privileged few.

"Sure, the yacht clubs provide recreational facilities but only for a small percentage of the population. The average person can't join," she said.

She claims even if you can afford membership you have to go through a discriminatory screening process.

According to Bury, it is almost impossible on one hand for non-Jews to join the Island City Yacht Club and on the other hand for Jews or blacks to join the Royal Canadian Yacht Club.

Ward 6 senior alderman Bill Archer—also a member of Metro council who voted in favor of evicting island residents—is a member of the Royal Canadian Yacht Club.

Archer was also a member of the Toronto Island Committee, the body formed by the city of Toronto which submitted its report to council in September urging preservation of the island residents.

Archer voted against this recommendation at Metro council in December.

Curiously enough, while yacht club memberships do not come cheap, Metro's taxes on the yacht clubs are a lot more favorable than the taxes on the island residents' homes.

City figures on the Queen's City Yacht Club reveal it occupies 2.6 acres of land of Algonquin Island.

The rent for the 2.6 acres is about $2,400 a year which divides up to about $923 per acre.

Islanders on the other hand pay approximately $100,397 in rent and taxes for their 29 acres or about $3,458 per acre.

Thus, the Queen's City Yacht Club's taxes are roughly $2,500 per acre less than those of the island residents.

Splendor of Robarts inaccessible to cripples

By MARINA STRAUSS

To enter the Robart's library, a crippled person is now at the mercy of passers-by or an information desk clerk with a sharp ear.

Although a ramp from the Sussex Avenue entrance assures a person in a wheelchair access to the north doors, only revolving doors provide the public ready access to the main lobby.

The adjoining leaf doors are kept locked and are under an alarm system.

According to assistant librarian for reader services, H.C. Sholler, the person at the control desk, who "has the key to disengage the alarm and open the (leaf) doors" must be signalled.

A doorbell is to be installed on these doors, but for the moment a cripple can merely "rap on the glass."

"The work order to have the doorbell installed has not been executed yet," he noted, adding "now that this has come to my attention" he'll look into the problem and "shake them loose on it."

"The building is still under partial (outside) contract," Sholler indicated.

University archivist David Rudkin described an incident which took place one evening earlier this year when he noticed a cripple in a wheelchair unable to enter the library. Rudkin notified the information desk.

"The person finally did get into the library," Rudkin explained, "but the person at the control desk had to set off an alarm."

The person on control that particular evening was unaware of the special key, he said.

Sholler was quick to point out the library does have provisions for cripples: "Special ramps within the library connect levels of floors which are different, (sic)," he said.

Information desk clerks who are also provided with a key to the elevators, "can send a crippled person to whatever floor he or she wants," Sholler asserted.

He added, although a cripple is unable to enter the rare books section from the outside, it is accessible from within the Robarts.

"I have not yet had any requests (from cripples) to go to the rare books," Sholler said.

Sholler noted the Paraplegic Society in Toronto has been informed of the library's facilities.

Questioned on the crippled person's accessibility to the building, library personnel head Michael McCahill replied: "It's not exactly easy, but it can be done."

Proposal for honors degrees defeated

By ROBIN THOMPSON

A proposal to have honors degrees awarded to four year honor students was defeated Monday by the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

The motion proposed that beginning in 1975-76 the honors degree would be granted to students with a four year degree in specified programs or double minor programs who secured at least 75 per cent in their last ten courses.

Among the members present was J. B. Conacher, who argued that the honors degree is a Canadian concept which most Canadian universities have.

University of Toronto abandoned it because it wasn't essential to the new program.

He also said the concept should be reintroduced so that the better and more serious students can be recognized as having obtained an honors degree from the university.

This in turn would prove helpful in getting accepted into other schools and businesses. Conacher found it unsatisfactory to restrict the honors degree to first class honors.

Math professor Ed Barbeau gave the results of a poll taken from math students at the university, in which 90 per cent were in favor of the return of the honors degree.

Barbeau was sympathetic to the idea of students getting honors on the basis of a program of some difficulty.

He also stated because of the difficulty in fitting it into the structure of the new program he was beginning to reject the idea.

Also attending the meeting was student Bob Bettson who felt the resolution for the honors degree was ill-conceived.

His argument was based on the fact that it would be a waste of time and money especially while the university is facing financial cutbacks.

Bettson said he holds no respect for the position to bring in the honors degree.

These lively folks of the Arts And Science General Committee defeated a proposal for honors degrees.

He feels a student cannot be evaluated this way. He also feels the mark system is the most unjust of all, if not ludicrous.

Economics professor J. E. Floyd challenged Bettson with the argument that spending money for the benefit of the students is a desirable objective.

Floyd went on to say the student with nothing else going for him relies entirely on what he can achieve and deserves some recognition for his achievement.

Floyd felt it was wise to get rid of the old system at the time it did.

Philosophy professor D.P. Dryer suggested if the amended motion was passed then it should be made explicit that it is an honors distinction for the student's overall grades and not in a specialist program.

Political economy professor Art Kruger agreed with Bettson in that the proposal will create numerous committees to meet with students and would therefore prove time consuming.

With this in mind, Kruger felt the proposal to be unworkable.

On tenure: Ignorance, Thy name is bliss

There's an untenured professor in the history department who does not like lowly students deciding whether he gets tenure.

Up-and-coming history professor Michael Bliss, a member of the Forster task force on academic appointments, says in a letter he would rather see tenure decided by faculty who have "to suffer this imposition."

Bliss' comments are made in a letter to the subcommittee of the academic affairs committee of Governing Council charged with deciding the issue of students on tenure committees.

Bliss accuses students desiring a say in tenure decision of having an "ulterior motive," although he does not say what that motive is.

He claims ulterior motives because faculty members, according to his letter at least, do not like sitting on the departmental committees.

"I do not believe that undergraduate students have the wisdom, experience, and maturity to undertake that job," Bliss says of student participation on tenure committees.

"I base this belief on my own experience as a student, my discussions with other former students—a number of whom were once student activists—and my observations of student leaders in my department and the university in general."

Student organizations, says Bliss, "would have no greater knowledge of a candidate (for tenure) than anyone chosen at random in the middle of the front campus."

In addition such student bodies are "self-appointed at best, moribund or non-existent at worst" as well as lacking any broad-based support.

Bliss also charges there would be a conflict of interest if a student studying under a candidate for tenure were also on the candidates tenure committee.

He does concede there are students who might be qualified to sit on tenure committees, but they "are usually those most concerned with pursuit of their studies and service on tenure committees would be an unfair imposition and burden on their time."

With echoes of the Forster report ringing in the background, Bliss concludes there simply are "no satisfactory methods of selecting appropriate students to tenure committees."

In fact, Bliss says, student participation in tenure decisions could result in "very strong pressures on the faculty association to enter the arena of collective bargaining to give its members a greater degree of job security."

Bliss draws the scenario of a faculty member denied tenure because of the votes of student representatives, and then asks:

"What would the reaction be of a faculty member who lost his job because of the decision of an undergraduate?"

Even though he himself has never sat on a departmental tenure committee because he does not have tenure himself, Bliss is convinced sitting on a tenure committee is no fun.

"Serving on a tenure committee should not be something anyone wants to do and... faculty members normally undertake this service only because it is required of them."

76-year-old acquitted

By TIM GALLAGHER

William Temple, 76, a former CCF MPP who beat then Ontario premier George Drew in the 1948 election, was acquitted Monday on a charge of common assault, by Provincial Judge C.J. Cannon.

Temple was arrested during the 14-week long Artistic Woodwork strike allegedly for pushing a police constable during picket line scuffling between pickets and police.

The defence was conducted by Temple himself who summed up his case by telling Cannon: "It's a question of credibility. If you believe the policeman's evidence you'll convict me and I will pay the penalty."

"If, however, you believe my evidence you will acquit me but the policeman will pay no penalty even if he is lying."

"He can leave this court room and do the same thing again and even be promoted for it. He might even become head of the emergency task force."

During the trial, Temple made it known he was asked by the constable at the time of arrest, if he was drunk. He was later asked if he was a Communist.

Temple, who was once active in the now-defunct Ontario Temperance Federation, said he was neither.

The trials arise out of the Artistic Woodwork strike which was settled in December after bitter confrontations between police and pickets at two plants in North York.

The strike resulted in 108 arrests. To date, 41 people have been convicted and 28 acquitted.

The Canadian Textile and Chemical Union (CTCU) held a press conference on Monday to discuss the Artistic Woodwork trials.

Union spokesmen cited three disagreements with the way courts have been handling the Artistic trials so far.

They said judges have not considered "contradictions in police testimony especially when photographic evidence has been produced by the defence."

Union observers at the Artistic trials have said the courts "generally convict if there is any doubt over guilt."

The union feels police evidence has been discredited enough to reverse this trend.

In addition, the union claims there have been violations of normal court procedures.

For instance, one picket in hospital for appendicitis, had sent a signed doctor's statement to court explaining his inability to stand trial on the required date.

The court refused to accept this statement and summoned the doctor to court to testify the fact, according to the union.

The union also mentioned the doctor had to cancel a full-day's appointments to testify in court.

It's direct distance dialing for the long distance freaks at the Varsity. Calling in for the fun were staffers Tom Grand, Marina "the operator" Strauss, Gary Wieland, Jan and Larry Clarke, Marilyn Emerson, Gene Allan, Robin Thompson, Tim Gallagher, Igor, "Dial Tone" Bettison. No thanks to Paul McGrath for not letting me use the horse.

I CAN'T BELIEVE I ATE THE WHOLE THING!

Simcoe Hall should fix up Sussex houses

According to business affairs officer Randy Grimes the Innis College co-operative housing project problem "is just a matter of economics".

What the....! "Just a matter of economics"? Well, not really, Randy. What about the new Innis tenants that will get hit for the repairs which U of T was ordered to do last July? But we suppose that his answer is partially correct. After all, the university makes no secret of the fact that it operates as a public corporation and the people be damned.

Business also takes a low profile in this case. W.J.D. Lewis just happens to be chairman of the university's powerful planning and resources committee and a director of Crown Trust at the same time.

Guess who's the middleman for the university in its housing deals? Right, Crown Trust. So we seem to have the Lewis-Crown Trust Connection. Yet another governing council Conservative government appointee with a conflict of interest? Just one big happy family compact, eh W.J.D.?

The Innis story began last July with city hall issuing orders for the university to clean up its act within 90 days or else face some charges. With October approaching the repairs, of course, still weren't done. But no one seemed to really care.

Innis college has taken the position now that they're getting the best deal possible. We disagree. Innis College's principal Peter Russell said only two weeks ago: "There's really little point to have the university fix the plaster now when we'll be having the same plaster ripped out in a few months." Russell seems to be taking an ostrich-like approach: pretend you don't see trouble and there won't be any. He does not seem overly concerned that Innis would have to do the major repairs the university was ordered to complete last year.

We don't think that renovations should be done just to have pieces torn down again either. However, there is the matter of the leaky basement in 16 Sussex, the decayed flooring in the first floor of 20 Sussex St., etc. etc. (We checked the work repair orders at city hall.)

Once again the university is fooling around. Caught in a tight-money situation it's handling people like (business) commodities, passing the buck onto the future tenants of the Inn-Res Co-op Ltd. plan. With a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation loan totalling about $250,000 it's understandable why the university doesn't want to shell out the money.

Unfortunately the buck will be passed to the new tenants — and there it stops.

We shouldn't be too hard on Crown Trust either. After all, that firm just administers the houses for U of T and is not legally reliable or responsible for the repairs, right? However, Crown Trust housing manager John Gibson claimed last week he merely "takes orders from (Simcoe Hall's) Grimes." And does Grimes take orders from Crown Trust's and Simcoe Hall's W.J.D. Lewis?

Grimes has claimed that major repairs have been done on the houses, but Innis residence coordinator Laura Bradbury completely denies this. "Major work had not been done on the houses", she said last week.

We're lost. Riding the Simcoe Hall merry-go-round gets kind of tiring after awhile. However, once you get used to the hypocrisy, sitting back and watching the full-time university bureaucrats run four-sided circles around people gets to be amusing, even if it is pathetic.

We can't help but recall business affairs vice-president Alex Rankin's statements to us at city hall last October. Rankin had just gone through somewhat of a bear-pit session with some rather angry residents the university was attempting to push around. Acting extremely conciliatory at the time Rankin looked at us and smiled: "Well this marks the beginning of a whole new relationship with the community." We merely replied, "We'll see."

Sometimes cynicism has its virtues. We hope the inn-Res people are prepared for a strong dose of it.

One glimmer of hope remains. Last week—in another office in Simcoe Hall — business affairs person Kell Gregory told he was sure the remaining repairs would be covered by the Innis renovations. "All the houses are being renovated as far as I understand," he said.

Gregory then added the Innis Co-op would have to assume the remaining repairs even though this wasn't specified in the lease, which still has to be signed.

We were somewhat surprised when Gregory added: "If Innis doesn't do it, we'll do it."

We assume the "we" means the university.

Ok Kille you're on: get your colleagues off their posteriors and get those houses fixed. You're only four months overdue.

And now for something completely different....

Duty to answer mental cripples on South Africa

In our busy round of teaching, studying, and playing, it is painful to take the time to engage in lengthy correspondence with such mental cripples as James P. Hull. But it is our duty. Had more people taken the time to reply to Hitler's racist rantings the world might not have been passive witnesses to the results of Hull's philosophy in Germany.

We did call Hull a liar. It was abundantly clear in our reply of January 9 to his letter that he did indeed lie about the situation in South Africa. Someone who tells lies is a liar. On the other hand, someone who takes the facts and presents a minority interpretation of those facts can be called a dissenter. But is it a fact that Blacks are inferior to Whites? To quote Hull: "To put it bluntly, they (South African Blacks) can't use the land efficiently."

The Black slaves of South Africa have certainly used the total land area of South Africa efficiently enough to create for their White masters a standard of living and luxury unsurpassed anywhere in the world.

Hull asks if we "...would also like to provide figures on how many peace-loving innocents, Black and White, have been butchered by the 'liberation' forces in Southern Africa." Indeed we would.

From January to August, 1973, 4,000 Angolans, many of them women and children, have died after eating crops that have been sprayed with herbicides and defoliants by the Portuguese in south-eastern Angola (see Anti-Apartheid News, July-August, 1973). Recent reports by Spanish and British Priests have described the massacre by Portuguese troops of about 400 Mozambican civilians in a village in Tete Province. This slaughter was given wide press and radio coverage when Father Adrian Hastings first presented this news to the public. As early as 1960, more than 500 villagers from Mueda in Northern Mozambique were slaughtered with grenades and machine-gun fire as, in a peaceful demonstration, they demanded independence from the Portuguese authorities.

We could go on with these gruesome statistics, as there have been many documented large-scale Portuguese atrocities against the Angolan and Mozambican people. But by now it should be clear that it is Black innocents who are being slaughtered by White colonialists. In addition, the Office of Public Information for the United Nations has documented reports of South African military aid to the Portuguese in Angola and Mozambique, as well as numerous reports on the oppression of apartheid in South Africa itself. These sources are easily available for Hull and others to read.

We question the sources of Hull's facts. Not even the South African government itself claims that 50% of the arable land in South Africa is Bantu, yet this is one of Hull's 'facts'. But aside from this, Hull does not refute the disparity we pointed out between the wealth, health, education and political power of Blacks and Whites in South Africa. Instead he chooses to compare the relative wealth of Black South Africans which they have created under the whip of the Whites to that of Blacks in independent African countries. The comparison should be more accurately made as follows: All of South Africa benefits from the heavy investment of the western world in its industrial economy. The Blacks of South Africa however benefit not nearly as much because of the inferior position to which they are relegated by the Whites. Independent African states, on the other hand, suffer from the lack of investment in their economies. Their GNP and per capita income is lower because the western world deliberately keeps them in a position of suppliers of raw materials and importers of manufactured goods.

Hull's comments concerning Bantustan Homelands were particularly distressing, as he upheld this development as a move in the direction of freedom for Blacks. In fact, the South African government's policy is to remove black families from the urban (White) areas to the Bantustan Homelands with the aim of creating a labor force domiciled in the rural areas, which migrates to the urban areas as single workers. Among other things, married couples are split forcibly and forced to live in the reservation nearest his/hers working area. (Africa Bureau Document Paper, June 1973) About 15 million South Africans are now 'citizens' of these homelands. These areas at the end of 1968 occupied 56,475 square miles, which is about 11.9 per cent of the total land in the Republic. In addition, Bantustan 'governments' are restricted to administering and implementing policy decisions made by Whites in Pretoria. For further information on these and other issues, we would recommend the 1973 Report of the World Relationships Committee of the YWCA of Canada called "Investment in Oppression." Surely even

Hull can't question the integrity of the YWCA.

In response to Hull's assertion that the standard of living of non-White South Africans is rapidly rising, we would refer him to the 1973 report by the Manchester Guardian concerning the investigation of 100 British companies in South Africa. With the exception of only three companies, all British firms were paying their employees between one-third and one-half of the minimum subsistence standard required for an African family to avoid malnutrition (The poverty datum line is £10-£11 a week for a family of five). In addition, there are numerous reports about the general unrest and suppression of Black workers.

But certainly GNP and per capita income are not the main issues at stake here. What about the quality of life and the freedom and dignity of human beings? Compare for a moment the poor but proud and free Tanzanian peasants and workers to the relatively wealthier South African Blacks who commute from their factory jobs to the barbed-wire enclosed, disease-ridden, Black only locations.

This paragraph is aimed more specifically at the Varsity. Contrary to your Write-On section is stimulating and occasionally enlightening. But how much more Hull, Hitler, Klu Klux Klan, Western Guard garbage do we need to see in print? Newspapers serve a news and educational function. You also speak out on behalf of downtrodden students. Could you not devote more space to the plight of the oppressed people of the world and not to racist justifications of their inferior status. To transfer Hull's philosophy to the University of Toronto, for example, how many letters would you print that said that students here should be kept powerless and in poverty relative to the administration and professors since they are incapable of anything better and besides they're better off than students at York University.

Finally, we couldn't fail to notice Hull's consistency. Along with his racism he is a sexist. Our letter was clearly signed by Professor Puritt and Ms. Hurlich. Yet Hull consistently addressed himself to Professor Puritt only, ignoring the co-writer, a woman, who we assume he would lump with those other inferior human beings to whom he would deny any dignity.

Bettson neglects split pants

Although the student whose meeting you interrupted has 'not seen fit to write to the Varsity or phone you about her concerns', I hope it will be all right if I write you about my concerns, Bob.

My main concern right now is that I have seven essays which are due in the next three weeks. But each time

I start one of these essays, Bob, I find myself falling asleep.

My second concern is that I split my pants playing ping-pong this afternoon.

My third concern is that I have developed an addiction to apple strudel from the Huron Groceria.

Why don't you start worrying about a student's real problems, Bob?

Rotting corpses clog university

The question of tenure has intrigued me for quite a while and in doing some investigative research, I came across a very interesting case. Looking through the university records I found that the person with the longest tenure presently at the University of Toronto is professor Douglas Wapping of the history faculty. He has been at the university since 1924. This week I went to see him to ask him his opinions on tenure.

I arrived at his office and was greeted by an elderly secretary, Miss Clever. I asked to see Professor Wapping.

"I'm sorry," she said, "but you cannot go into see the professor."

"He isn't in?" I asked.

"Oh, he's in."

"Is he busy then?" I cried.

"No."

"Well then, why can't I see the professor?" I asked.

Miss Clever seemed to be irritated by my questioning.

"Professor Wapping has a certain condition," she said softly. "At first we thought it was just early signs of senility—the fact that he didn't leave his office for weeks and months and he sat with his face down in the bowl of pudding on his desk. At that point it started to dawn on me that the professor might be dead. The fact was confirmed to me last year when the professor failed to attend the staff New Year's Eve party and play Old Man Time."

"But you said he was in," I pointed out.

"That's right," she said annoyed.

"But that's ridiculous!" I exclaimed.

"No. That's policy," she replied.

"You see, the professor has tenure and once a person gains tenure, he can't be forced to leave the university unless there are grounds for dismissal."

"Well isn't death grounds for dismissal," I said thinking I won the point.

"Hardly," Miss Clever replied. "In fact in the two years since the professor died, the standards in his courses have improved. Students are learning more and getting better marks."

I was stunned.

Ma Bell's secret credit card code cracked

By IGOR "KGB" ROMANOVITCH
Special to The Varsity

NEW YORK (LNS-CUP)—In what amounts to a journalistic coup, the 1974 telephone credit card code has been announced by the Technological American Party (TAP).

While using a phony credit card in clandestine calls could get a person in deep shit, TAP related the experiences of fone freaks after disclosing the code.

According to TAP, the credit card code is based on the phone number of the company involved. That is the first part of the number.

The next three digits are a secret code indicating the city, but these three digits are not the area code. Toronto's secret number is 476, and Toronto's area code is 416, TAP says.

The last part of the number is in fact a letter, chosen by a special code: I-N, 2-X, 3-Z, 4-A, 5-G, 6-S, 7-Q, 8-F, 9-U, 0-J. To figure out which letter, TAP says to look at the fifth digit in the phone number and select the appropriate letter.

Using this system, TAP says, the credit card number for Bell Canada in Toronto would be: 368-3911-476-U.

Secret city codes for other Canadian centres include 473 for Ottawa and 493 for Vancouver, TAP says.

TAP reports the city code for Washington, DC, is 032, and indicates the telephone numbers for the Selective Service System and the Pentagon are 343-7188 and 697-7072 respectively.

Other city codes include New York City 012, Chicago 097, Spokane 128, TAP reports fone freaks who have used the system indicate they have had to know the name of the company, the area code and the city code to place a call.

The fone freaks always use a phone booth, according to TAP, and always hang up if the operator asks anything besides the number of the phone booth the call is coming from.

Because the operator sometimes listens in, especially during the first few seconds of a call, TAP says fone freaks generally are very careful about what they say on a call and fone freaks never talk for more than 15 minutes.

Fone freaks apparently get bad temporary cases of amnesia if the phone company starts calling up to find out what's going on with a lot of strange calls being used on a credit card number, TAP reports.

Strange people, these fone freaks.

NUS to formulate policies

BURNABY (CUP)—Three themes will dominate the fourth national conference of the National Union of Students as the organization continues to formulate policies applicable to students at a national level. Simon Fraser University will host the conference scheduled for May 2 to 5 in Burnaby BC.

The 'post secondary education—government and legislation' theme will concentrate on producing proposals for change in education legislation that NUS members can work for.

The student financing and legislation session will examine all aspects of financing including a special report on the needs of part time students. NUS central committee members hope to present a proposal for a complete overhaul of the present methods of student financing.

Student financing schemes now available are: the Canada Student Loan Plan, Canada Manpower Training Program, provincial bursaries loans and scholarships.

The third theme is participation: making a working national union—this will include discussions of the nature of internal relations between NUS and members' councils and the organization of NUS at the local level.

Anarchism misunderstood in the past, now to be a positive force

Anarchism, of all the major currents of modern social and political thought, has probably been subject to the grossest misunderstandings of its nature and objectives.

A useful starting place for a discussion of anarchism is the following succinct definition formulated by Peter Kropotkin: anarchism is "the name given to a principle or theory of life and conduct under which society is conceived without government - harmony in society being obtained, not by submission to law, or by obedience to any authority, but by free agreements concluded between the various groups, territorial and professional, freely constituted for the sake of production and consumption, as also for the satisfaction of the infinite variety of needs and aspirations of a civilized being."

A positive social doctrine

It is essential to realize that anarchism is a positive social doctrine - it is not the advocacy of chaos, confusion and disorder. Neither is anarchism synonymous with terrorism.

The misconception that anarchism is inseparable from assassination, bomb-throwing, and dynamiting is especially common (although there are elements of terrorism in anarchism - both in action in late 19th and early 20th centuries and in some theory that stresses the efficacy of individual action).

More positively, it should be stressed that anarchism is an anti-political, not merely an apolitical doctrine. It regards political authority, and its modern embodiment, the state, as the root of all evil, and the expiration of the state as its cardinal task. Thus, the foremost rivals and main sources of criticism of anarchism have always been liberalism, on the one hand, and socialism, or more specifically, Marxism, on the other.

At one end of the anarchist spectrum it is sometimes difficult to tell the anarchist individualist from the liberal, while at the other, the anarchist communist becomes almost indistinguishable from the socialist.

It has been said that anarchism employs a liberal critique of socialism and socialist critique of liberalism. Nonetheless, in doing so, anarchism retains its separate identity, and in actuality liberalism and Marxism prove to have more in common with each other than either does with anarchism.

Anarchism and liberalism?

Anarchists share with liberals their high valuation of individualism.

Most anarchists proclaim the sovereignty of the individual, and even those who advocate some form of communism generally justify it as the social arrangement most conducive to the full flowering of the individual.

Liberals and anarchists both abhor state encroachment on an individual's freedom. They often both speak the same language on issues such as civil rights and bureaucratic despotism.

Anarchists however, go much further than liberals in their opposition to government - seeing the government not as a necessary evil but as necessarily evil; seeing the law not as a necessary framework for the life of society, but as an instrument solely of tyranny.

In economic matters, anarchism denies the sanctity of private property and the free marketplace, institutions that liberalism, even in its modern welfare-state form has traditionally upheld.

Anarchists have criticized the exploitative character of capitalism in much the same terms as the socialists.

With the advent of Marxism, the majority of anarchists accepted the main outlines of its critique of capitalism and its objectives of abolishing private ownership of the means of production. At least until 1872, Marxism and anarchism were but two branches of the international socialist movement, and even thereafter they proceeded in many respects along parallel lines.

Anarchism and Marxism: man and nature

However, basic and far-reaching antagonisms between anarchism and Marxism stem from their different conceptions of the relationship between man and nature. In Marxism, nature is something man must master; he asserts himself over it, exploits it, and harnesses it to his own purposes.

There is an inherent opposition between man and nature that is expressed in man's quest to gain control over the forces of labour through his labour, to turn them to productive economic purposes, and to create the man-made world in which his own nature will realize itself.

In this respect, the domination of nature by man, Marxism is very similar to the spirit of liberalism, and both Marxism and liberalism are very different from anarchism.

Anarchism, sees the relationship between man and nature essentially as one of harmony, not as one of opposition. Human society is not a collective enterprise for the mastery of nature, and the ills of society stem from efforts to impose artificial development.

"Spontaneity" is one of the key words of anarchism. Seeking to restore man to nature rather than conquer it, anarchism celebrates the free play of human impulses. It wishes to release the natural forces of the personality rather than control them in order to direct them into economically productive areas.

The function of man's labour is not to remake the world around him but to manifest the creative forces of his personality.

With this as its central aspiration, anarchism sees no need for large and complex forms of social or economic organization. A communal organization welling up from below, in direct response to the true needs of its members, represents the proper arena for their activities. The state, with its powerful administrative and economic bureaucracies, imposes its authority from above, without the direct sanction of the individual or his immediate community. It (the state) inevitably develops objectives of its own and seeks to harness the energies of the societies it rules to pursue its own objectives.

Anti-intellectualism and individuality

Anarchism has also always contained a broad streak of anti-intellectualism, a distrust of rigorous intellectual constructs, and an exaltation of "life" over "thought". To the anarchists, the attempt to impose order on reality by means of rational consciousness, and encompass it within abstract theory, robs it of its infinite variety and individuality.

Neither this individualism nor anti-intellectualism means anarchism is inherently anti-industrial, or that all anarchists merely wish to turn the clock back to a world of simple peasants and independent craftsmen.

But it is true that anarchism questions the very essence of industrial-technological civilization: the seemingly compulsive urge to maximize economic production, and the mammoth scale of the institutions which that urge generates.

Such a civilization uproots the individual from his natural environment, isolates him from his fellows, and thwarts his self-development and self-enjoyment.

The renewal of interest in anarchism today can be traced to the growing awareness of the price that has been paid for the immense productivity and material abundance of modern

Anarchists Sacco and Vanzetti after their arrest in the United States in 1920

Industrial technology: industrial man has become separated from living nature as he has surrounded himself with more and more of his own products - and more and more of his own wastes; he has grown estranged from his neighbors and increasingly subject to the authority or remote, impersonal bureaucracies, both private and public; and he has felt his personal significance diminish as he has come to be regarded primarily as a producer and consumer of goods rather than as an individual whose true purpose is self-expression and self-growth.

Anarchism as a luxury

It seems possible that anarchism is in fact a luxury which the post-industrial world is only now beginning to be able to afford.

The material abundance provided by modern technology, in conjunction with the vastly increased leisure available, has at last created conditions in which serious attention can be paid to the preservation and enjoyment of the natural environment, to a more balanced and multifaceted kind of personal growth, and to a more intensive cultivation of communal relationships.

In a contemporary context, the traditional doctrines of anarchism take on new meaning as modern society begins to shift its emphasis from the task of generating material wealth to the task of utilizing it to enrich social and personal life.

The post-industrial society has changed the base of support for anarchism. Historically regarding the masses of industrial workers and peasants as its base, anarchism now finds most of its followers among students, "hippies", youthful dissidents, intellectuals, and professional workers.

Anarchist values and influences today are most in evidence among the educated, affluent, middle class young of the industrially developed countries.

However, to point out the relevance of anarchism today is hardly to advocate uncritical acceptance of it; on the contrary, awareness of its defects becomes all the more important as its attractiveness increases. One obvious defect is anarchism's inability (it hasn't as yet had the opportunity) to prove itself as a viable approach to economic organization. Even in a 'post-scarcity' society, the economic productivity must be maintained at some fairly high level. Is this possible with anarchism?

A second major problem is raised by anarchism's belief in the sense of community that lies at its very heart. Is mutual interest and natural sociability sufficient to resolve all major conflicts after the removal of all institutions, hierarchies and the exploitive economic system?

These reservations suggest that anarchism as an all-embracing social and political ideology, as a total alternative to the existing structure of society, is as fraught with contradictions today as it was in the past.

But today, and particularly within an ecological consciousness, anarchism definitely has the capacity to offer a timely and provocative challenge to prevailing values and institutions which, many people feel, are now beginning to yield dramatically diminishing returns.

If anarchism has a living role to play in social and political thought today, it is as an instrument of constructive criticism, as refreshing antidote to some of the self-inflicted poisons of life in our urban-industrial society.

The above article was excerpted from The Essentials of Anarchism edited by Marshall Shatz (Bantam). Other works on anarchism include George Woodcock's Anarchism: a history of libertarian ideas and movements, and Murray Bookchin's contemporary work, Post-Scarcity Anarchism.

Popular resistance in Paraguay fails to stop Itaipu

translated from BULLETIN POPULAIRE

The increasing Brazilian economic offensive in Paraguay began eight years ago at the same time as studies were being undertaken to develop the waters of the Parana River. The herding ranches, sugar refineries (including one producing 300,000 tons per year, enough to sweeten the mouths of six million people for a year), banks, insurance companies, and ultra-modern lumber mills were installed at breath-taking speed.

As for the Treaty of Itaipu, according to the terms of agreement, Brazil and Paraguay are, contractually at least, equal partners. The Brazilian regime has promised to guarantee the financing of the work (estimated at more than two billion dollars) on the condition that Paraguay repays the loan in the form of electricity. The output power of the central dam will reach 11 million kilowatts and will begin around 1982. The financial capital for the project, although it originates in Brazil, will be, to a very large extent, under the control of American firms. To reimburse the Brazilian financiers, Paraguay has to expect that all the energy in produced at Itaipu up to the year 2040 that would normally go to it will instead be directed toward Brazil.

In effect, it's predicted that Paraguay will only receive $36 million each year for the sale of this energy, while the Brazilians, for their part, will realize profits approximating $85 million with this same energy once it is brought into Brazilian territory. So in going to Brazil the energy in effect becomes worth more. While their investments are peacefully returned, the exploiters of the people of Rio and Brasilia will put $85 million worth of profits into their pockets each year.

The great reactionary family

President Stroessner, the founder of the "peaceful Paraguayan revolution" (so it's told) believes, in spite of everything, that the signing of the Treaty of Itaipu is the greatest historical event in Paraguay since national independence." But Itaipu is not a sign of any peaceful revolution, but more a regional-economic arrangement devised by the key figures in the great "reactionary Latin American" family.

It's known as a "great family" because almost two-thirds of the Latin American peoples live under the heel of openly fascist military regimes. Counting Garastazu in Brazil Stroessner in Paraguay, Banzer in Bolivia, Osario in Guatemala, Hernandez in Salvador, Duvalier in Haiti, Balaguer in the Dominican Republic, and without forgetting Pinochet in Chile, there are already 120 million Latin Americans living under dictatorial regimes.

The Paraguayan opposition

The Parana River arrangement, this "great historical undertaking"—or the "project of the century" as Bourassa said about James Bay, 5,000 miles to the north — brought on the unanimous rejection and anger from Paraguayans.

Even the liberal or reformist opposition parties — the Radical Liberal Party, the Febrerist Revolutionary Party, and the Christian Democratic Party — which traditionally serve to support and screen democracy in the Stroessner regime, raised their voices and organized demonstrations to reject this agreement that they called a "vulgar alms" and a "crumb of bread."

This part of the bourgeoisie decided to take a seemingly "progressive" position because, like the proletariat in the country, but for opposite reasons, it had a vested interest and didn't want to lose control of the natural resources of the country.

On these grounds, the "official" opposition rallied against the dominant tendency of the bourgeoisie in power which would have allowed the Americans to penetrate the country economically as much as they wanted to, very often under a Brazilian guise.

As for the workers, the Paraguayan Trades Confederation (CPT) doesn't serve as an opposition force, but rather as a prop to the present government. The CPT hasn't taken part in a strike for 14 years. It is strongly influenced by the American Institute for the Development of Free Syndicalism, which opened a subsidiary branch in Paraguay in November, 1971. This union agency was identified by the New York Times as one of the American agencies financed by the CIA.

In spite of the relative lack of information from Paraguay, and despite the repression of the regime, strong popular struggles are being waged.

The Communist Party, having a revolutionary orientation, works clandestinely and is proposing the formation of a Democratic Front of National Liberation comprised of all the patriot forces which haven't compromised with the regime. It feels that the struggle for the liberation of political prisoners is one of the most important aspects of the struggle and that it's the popular struggles directed towards the overthrow of the regime itself that will free the prisoners from their cells.

During the past few years, the Paraguayan people have exposed the Stroessner regime many times. In 1969 the hard struggles of students against academic and political repression as well as the demonstrations against Rockefeller's visit shook the country for several months.

Numerous strikes took place to protest the many job lay-offs. And in August, 1970, 200 workers families of Puerto Casado occupied the railway station and seized several wagons to protest against the large-scale dismissal and evictions from dwelling places. The struggle made such an impact that the regime felt obliged to organize an organization of popular struggles for these families.

More recently, it was the struggles and the pressure of political groups that caused the regime to modify one of the clauses of the Itaipu. In effect, Article 18 of the Treaty to "unilateral acts", and giving to Brazil to intervene in Paraguayan territory and to use "political measures" if necessary. The country protest demonstrations. A clause took place and now each country can only intervene in its respective territory.

Integration into Brazil

In spite of these small struggles which reiterated, on paper, a barrier to the Brazilian exploitation, and despite an opposition that becomes more and more organized, the Stroessner regime seems never to lay the groundwork for the economic and political integration of Paraguay into Brazil with a wholehearted backing.

And many more projects for the Itaipu dam are in store in the government in Asuncion. The Chaco highway which will connect Bolivia, the Bolivia-Paraguay international steelworks plant (day), the dredging of the river to facilitate commerce between Paraguay, and Uruguay to Bolivia, a way out to the south through the ports in the region.

By and large, the Paraguayan government constitutes the economic project in the South America.

But it's important to note that these agreements, far from representing a step ahead in the development of the country, in fact signals a further step in the structures of underdevelopment, increases the dependence of Paraguay on Brazilian power, reinforces the political positions of authoritarianism in the region, and leads toward stifling the Argentine which is already in a crisis.

This Brazilian offensive is more ambitious, since Brazil's cheaper hydro-electricity that's also more accessible, all, closer to the industrial area than anything that Brazil can offer.

Consequences for the region

Argentina is another neighboring country with a geographical location, and will lose much if the waters doesn't take into account.

Unlike Brazil, Argentina depends fundamentally on the exploits as the energy of the Parana River on the one hand and the mines of Mutun on the other.

According to Paraguayan exiles in Argentina, there are more than 300 political prisoners in the prisons of Stroessner's regime. In an interview granted to Prensa Latina, some members of the "Front for the home country" organization indicated that terror continuously reigned against those who opposed the regime in their country and, moreover, peasants are massacred and Indians exterminated.

Paraguay has also imprisoned the three oldest political prisoners on the continent: Antonio Maidana, Julio Rojas and Alfredo Lacoste, thrown in jail 15 years ago and still awaiting trial.

American operations and institutions are teaching the Paraguayan officers stationed in the Chaco region torture methods which have already been introduced into other Latin American countries. In the Chaco area the regime has concealed many concentration camps where opponents of the regime are kept.

Since the last election the "silent" and subtle fascism of Stroessner has imprisoned approximately 500 citizens, for the most part peasants, but also workers, students, and political leaders. For 20 years now a large number of political militants have been assassinated and it's not rare to see the mutilated bodies of the opponents of the regime floating down the Parana River.

only be removed from the ground in a case where ships can get at it and dig it up from the rivers of the basin.

Argentina, like Uruguay, is also the country which runs the maximum risks with the development of power projects from the waters in this region. The possible rupture of one of the dams holding back the water could have tragic consequences for this country, whose northern part is located at the mouth of the Rio de la Plata.

All the more, Argentina and Paraguay would be the two biggest losers if the waters from the rivers were contaminated by polluting industries which had plants installed without controls on the Brazilian side of the border. And taking into account the current 'philosophy' of the Brazilian government with respect to pollution, the likely decision is to be development no matter what the price, without consideration for national character, be it social, human, or health goals. One cannot expect Brazil to be in any position of strength to impose very high standards on the foreign enterprises located on its territory.

Finally, another danger results from the spreading of "schistosoma," a disease which removes from its victims practically all ability to work. The "molluscs" which transmit the disease proliferate in stagnant deposits of water such as those created by the dams. More and more people are being affected by the disease in Brazil; in reality there are 12 million people who are presently ill, and the health department statistics predict that approximately 20 million people will be stricken by the disease by 1980.

The new construction would also signal the reduction of river commerce of such towns as Rosario, Sante Fe, and Resistencia in Argentina, according to the variations on the level of the water affected by the dams. And, as if by chance, it was recently proposed that the water system and the river harbours of the riverain counties of the La Plata River system be readjusted and the docking activities be centralized at Montevideo, the capital of Uruguay, another Brazilian "colony."

As can easily be seen, everything is clearly and logically planned for the future, and everything centres around Brazil when it comes to the question of Latin American hegemony and power. It's without doubt an "economic plan of a capitalist system!" Itaipu, like Cabora Bassa, and like James Bay, will help the factories of the most rapacious capitalists. Itaipu is yet another reason for the Paraguayan people to lead a fierce fight against one of the shadiest regimes in modern history.

Bulletin Populaire is a French-language publication put out by l'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec. The weekly magazine can be obtained from APLQ at 2074 Beaudry, Montréal, Québec.

When the Itaipu electrical plant is in operation Brazil will almost double its capacity for electrical energy production.

The Paraná River plays a very important role in the energetic Brazilian program. At least two power plants are already in place on that part of the river which lies within Brazilian territory and lower down, along the Paraguay River, the Acarai powerhouse has begun to produce electricity designed almost exclusively for export. That project cost $60 million and was partially financed by the International Development Bank.

At the beginning of December, Argentina and Paraguay signed an agreement for the construction of the Yacireta-Apita dam. The work will begin in 1976 and is estimated to cost Argentina $1 million; the 10 turbines are expected to be in service in 1981, producing 3.3 million kilowatts of power.

And if Argentina's other plans are realized — if Paraguay gives its consent — another imposing construction project would take place a little to the south. This is the Corpus project which is planned for 1987, and negotiations have already begun about this new power development.

Linkage and co-ordination is necessary for these different projects to be completed. For example, the extent and breadth of one dam can drown — or dry up — another affected project. Argentina has already felt some of the difficulties and dangers of these projects, since the Itaipu dam project now appears to be an obstacle to the realization of the Yacireta and Corpus projects. The conclusions of the political and technical disagreements provoked by this situation would satisfy both Brazil and Argentina at the same time.

Deep Throat slashed at Sir George Williams

MONTREAL (CUP) — Five students were detained Jan. 25 at Sir George Williams for showing an allegedly pornographic film, Deep Throat.

They were held for two and one half hours by members of the Montreal urban community police morality squad and were not allowed to contact either lawyers or university officials.

The film was shown by the Engineering Undergraduate Association of SWGU in the main university building, the Hall Building.

Contrary to their intentions the EUA did not check all ID cards when people were admitted because ticket takers were drunk.

The audience thus included two unwitting guests by the time the show began—two officers from the morality squad.

After sitting through the first two showings of the film police returned to the stations, obtained warrants and returned to arrest the student organizers about 40 minutes after the film ended.

Larry Mogelon, president of the EUA and Peter Krug, head of Television Sir George, along with three other members of the EUA executive were questioned by police.

The videotape recording equipment, two videotape monitors and the Deep Throat tape were also seized by police.

Officials at SGWU expressed doubts about the legality of the police entering the university without a warrant.

According to the Dean of Students at the university, it was the first time police had entered the building without permission from the administration.

Even during the computer riot of 1969 police entered only with that permission.

The Georgian has learned police can enter the university if there is criminal activity going on.

On the other hand, they are not allowed on campus for other matters such as political activism unless forms are signed by the administration or building manager.

No one knows who contacted the police. One story is that a man in his 30s or 40s telephoned various organizations around the university asking if Deep Throat was really going to be shown.

An unrelated showing of the film, Deep Throat, at U of T on October 12 resulted in three U of T students being charged with exposing an obscene movie to public view. Trial date is scheduled for March 19.

Deep Throat slash rehashed at McMaster

HAMILTON (CUP) — Regional police and university officers have seized a print of the controversial movie, Deep Throat, following a raid at McMaster University.

Three third year social science students had been questioned concerning the alleged showing January 24.

At approximately 10 pm a group of regional police arrived at the offices of campus security with a search warrant for the auditorium in the Physical Sciences Building.

Eight regional police and five security guards sealed off the exits to the 350 people in the room.

Following the seizure of the film,

Donald Ryder, Michael McNeil and John Fortier were questioned.

Information from the police is scarce, and it is not clear if the three have been charged or merely questioned for information by police.

Rumors that the film might be shown had been circulating on campus for the last few weeks.

Tickets were apparently sold for a King Mystery Raffle at $3.50 each.

Mike Hedden, McMaster administration vice president said the McMaster's Explorers Club had booked the room in the Engineering Building for the night but at the last minute changed to the Physical Sciences Building.

Because of the last minute change normal security checks were circumvented. Aside from ensuring that the room was not already booked, no checks were made.

Deep Throat is the story of a woman who finds that oral gratification is the only variety of sex she can enjoy due to a physical abnormality.

It was banned in several cities in the United States and was never passed by the Ontario Censor Board last fall.

The McMaster Film Board examined the possibility of showing the film at McMaster, but after receiving legal advice from the student's union lawyers, decided it was not advisable to run the risk of prosecution.

In a press release the board said they had no intention of showing the film while current obscenity laws exist in Ontario.

The last incident of this type at McMaster occurred several years ago when some students were charged with producing an obscene film, Columbus of Sex.

U of T movie-goer Starvin' Galbraith refused to comment on the bust at Mac. With a haughty "Talk to my lawyer," he paraded around the SAC office, denouncing all epidermis films and racism.

Broadcast injunction case adjourned until Friday

The move by Canada Metals Co. Ltd. to get five journalists jailed for their coverage of lead pollution in Toronto's east end was postponed until Friday.

The firm is attempting to get a contempt of court citation against three Canadian Broadcasting Corporation employees, two Globe and Mail employees and the chairman of the Canadian Liberation Movement.

Monday's court proceeding was adjourned so CLM chairman, Gary Perly, can question persons who filled out affidavits supporting Canada Metals' allegation that the six respondents violated a January 29 temporary injunction.

That injunction, one of the rare instances of prior restraint in Canadian history, prohibited the CBC radio show, As It Happens, from broadcasting certain sections of a documentary about lead pollution which dealt in part with Canada Metals.

The Globe and the CLM are in the Supreme Court action by Canada Metals because the company feels they along with the CBC still printed or broadcast material in violation of the injunction.

However, in court Perly said he thinks the lead company is in contempt of court because the company "got the original interim injunction by fraudulently supplying information."

News blackout leads to ignorance of Namibia

By BOB BETTSON

To many Canadians Namibia is not a name which comes readily to mind when one thinks of Africa.

Probably the reason is that it is better known as South West Africa under the illegal government of South African Prime Minister John Vorster.

The visit of two South West African "Peoples' Organization (SWAPO) representatives to Toronto comes at a time when Canadian government and corporate policy of aiding the South African regime is under constant attack from liberation movements and their supporters.

It is not surprising Canadians know little of this forgotten desert land in Southern Africa, because in fact there is a news blackout, there are no journalists in the country and none are going to be allowed in by the white supremacist government.

The South African presence in Namibia is an illegal one. Namibia rightfully belongs to its black citizens, according to the UN.

The way South Africa was able to extend its hegemony over it was through a mandate given it by the now-defunct League of Nations in 1920.

In 1920 the South Africans got what they wanted, carte blanche from a weak organization to "protect" the people of Namibia until they reached independence.

Naturally this has never happened. Namibia has become an integral part of the illegal South African regime. It is integral to the economic viability of the attempt by the South African whites to maintain their superiority in spite of a numerical minority position.

But the South African position has not gone unchallenged. Since 1966 there has been a guerilla struggle to oust the illegal regime and replace it with a democratically-elected Namibian government.

This struggle has gone on almost without the notice of the western world because of a press blackout. Not surprisingly the policy of western governments has been to support the South African government in actions if not in words.

While statesmen mouth platitudes about racial justice at the UN, Canadian corporations go on exploiting the black workers of South West Africa for what the SWAPO representatives call "slave wages."

Unfortunately the government has also seen fit to encourage a continuation of this investment as well as extending obsolete preferential commonwealth tariffs to South Africa. South Africa pulled out of the British Commonwealth in 1960.

The Canadian presence in South West Africa is maintained by Falconbridge Mines, Noranda Mines, Brierley Mines, New Wellington Mines, Syracuse Oil Co Ltd., and Hudson's Bay Company.

One of the SWAPO representatives suggested Canadians boycott any companies dealing in the Karakul furs, which would suggest the great Canadian institution, the Hudson Bay Company is a logical target for the Canadian support organizations.

SWAPO was founded in 1959 and started by encouraging militant action to defy the regime. These non-violent strikes and protests were brutally repressed by the government.

This led to an escalation of the struggle until 1966 when it became a war of liberation. SWAPO was forced underground in 1963 and there was little other alternative for the freedom fighters.

Namibians are in a subordinate economic position in their own land—whites controlling the government, the educational systems, the land, the economic system and the police and courts.

There seems to be no alternative for the people other than violent means, SWAPO says. One of the soft spoken revolutionaries said "violence is the only language they listen to."

In the last two years the struggle has escalated. There was a nationwide strike of 13,000 workers focused on the contract labor system, "a concrete symbol of South African colonial domination in Namibia."

Since then there have been massive public rallies by the Namibian youth leagues and increasingly militant stands by the churches resulting in the deportation of missionaries.

Foreign pressure has increased and no doubt the success of the liberation movements in Portuguese African and especially the new country of Guinea Bissau have encouraged the SWAPO liberationists to continue their struggle against the colonial domination of South Africa.

"The only listen to violence," says SWAPO's Mshaka Muyongo.

Rochdale mortgage foreclosed but residents not affected

By DICK BROWN

A decision Monday by the Ontario Supreme Court to foreclose Rochdale College's first mortgage probably will have little immediate effect on the college, according to Rochdale spokesmen.

That decision allows Rochdale six months to pay the first mortgage. If the money is not paid by then, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC)—holders of the first mortgage—may take possession of the building.

Meanwhile, a move is afoot in Rochdale to find someone to buy the Rochdale high-rise building at 341 Bloor St. W.

However, that would not end Rochdale College as the college is planning to move into an urban setting eventually but not housed in a high-rise.

Monday's court decision was the culmination of a lengthy court battle by Rochdale's mortgage holders.

Five mortgages are held on the Bloor Street property, the first mortgage held by CMHC and the second by Revenue Properties Central Development Ltd.

Only the first two were involved in Monday's decision.

The court ruled, in effect, that CMHC has first grabs on the property by virtue of the first mortgage and Revenue Properties must wait its turn after CMHC.

For Rochdale residents the court decision has little immediate impact, and it's Rochdale as usual.

"We're not about to be booted out," a Rochdale spokesperson said yesterday. "There's a legal redemption period" of six months.

The court case against Rochdale's building has been going on since 1971 when foreclosure proceedings first got off the ground.

Rochdale residents are not saying what the back mortgage money involved is, but other sources report a figure of about $5 million or more.

Rochdale spokesmen point out the court case has nothing to do with recent shrill calls in Toronto's daily newspapers for Rochdale's closure, but rather the court case was fought on the legal technicalities of mortgage law.

To help offset the legal costs Rochdale folk are still selling degrees

Interfac swim meet

During the weekend, the men's badminton team won their sectional tournament at McMaster. The final score was Toronto 10 McMaster 7, and Guelph 1. In curling, Toronto and Queen's placed first and second in the east section and go to the finals at Brock this weekend. Skip Craig Harris with Randy Neal, Paul Freedman, and Don Dowding are the members of the Toronto team. In a women's basketball game, Laurentian edged Toronto 40-

38. Scoring for Toronto were Anne Williams with 12 points, Chris Crawford (10), Leslie McIntosh (4), Karen Edgar (4), Martha Williams (4), Daina Zukauskas (2), and Pat Williams (2). The wrestling team sent two members down to compete against the Michigan Wrestling Club in Ypsilanti, Michigan. Bob Moore, wrestling in the 136½ pound class, placed fifth. Steve Tisberger, in the 149½ pound class, finished sixth. The wrestling team meets Guelph this weekend in a warmup for the OUA finals at Western February 15 and 16....

Interfac swimming championships will be held Thursday at 6 p.m. at the Hart House pool. The Fitzgerald Trophy will be awarded on the aggregate points of this meet and the fall meet. T.A. Reed Trophy points will be awarded for entries and positions in the race.

All undergraduates and graduate students who are members of the Athletic Association are eligible. Current swim team members are not allowed to compete.

Entries, including names and alternatives for relay teams, will be accepted at the Intramural Office, Room 106, Hart House, or at the meet up to five minutes before the race is called.

The meet starts at 6 p.m., with warm-ups at 5:30. All entrants must report to the marshal at the first call for the event.

The events will be 200 medley relay, 200 free, 300 individual medley relay, 200 breast, 50 back, 50 fly, 8 times 50 free relay, using 2-8 swimmers in any order. Each participant is restricted to three events. The heats will be timed finals only.

Regardless of the number of entries in each event, scoring will be as follows: for the relays, 14-10-8-6-4-2; all other events, 7-5-4-3-2-1.

It's all over now, Lady Blues

By DIANE WARDROPE

The Lady Blue's ice hockey team increased their winning streak to 10 games last weekend in a come-from-behind 5-4 victory over Guelph.

Not used to playing on a smaller ice surface, Toronto made some bad passes that Guelph was able to capitalize on. The smaller surface also contributed to both teams crowding around the puck and the referees were quick to call some wild penalties, with most being handed to Toronto.

The first period showed Guelph's desire to win as they did everything except score. This continued on into the second period as Guelph again dominated the play. The score at the end of the period was 3-1 for Guelph. Toronto's lone goal was scored by Lorraine Sherman.

Coach Brown must have fired up the team between periods because they came back and scored three goals in less than three minutes to make it 4-3 Toronto. Margi Goldsmith, Angie Comb and Lynda Harley counted for Toronto. Guelph tied it up with seven minutes left to play on a goal while they were short-handed.

Toronto couldn't score, try as they might. A few offsidies were called against the Blues to increase their frustrations.

The team next travels to Hamilton, then returns to play two home games next week against York and Queen's.

Fencers finish fourth

By YOKO ODE

At the OWIAA fencing championships held in Toronto last weekend, the Toronto women's fencing team finished fourth.

Last year's champions, University of Ottawa, were not able to defend their title as they were eliminated in an earlier sectional. The strongly favoured McMaster team swept the tournament without a loss. U of T who had beaten McMaster in the sectionals did not perform to their capability and eventually finished fourth.

The rookie team fenced well, however, most of its members were without much competitive background and the experience gained this year will insure that U of T will be a bigger threat at next year's championship.

The individual competition was of a high quality. Twelve fencers from the three sections battled it out on Saturday. Six fencers were eliminated in first round and the eventual finalists were C. Wishart, J. Mallin (Ottawa), A. Bayer (Queen's), S. Williams (York), L. Taguchi (McMaster), Anne Stokes (U of T).

Sharon Williams, a Welsh International fencer, appeared to be making great strides to be the eventual winner, but Anne Stokes suddenly poured on the power and overcame all of the strongly favoured competition. The final result was only achieved after one barrage between Williams, Wishart, Stokes and Mallin.

Williams and Mallin were eliminated and the final barrage between Stokes and Wishart had the large crowd on their feet throughout the bout. Anne Stokes fenced superbly to beat Wishart 4-1 and was a worthy winner.

FACULTY OF ARTS AND SCIENCE COUNCIL AND COMMITTEES ANNOUNCEMENT OF ELECTION

One half of the elected membership of the Council and its Committees retires each year, to be replaced by elected members who will be elected for two years. The following summary relates particularly to the responsibilities of the elected student and faculty members of Council and the function and role of the Committees on which they will serve.

The major committee in the structure is the General Committee which has 49 elected students, 91 elected faculty and 59 ex-officio members such as College Heads, Department Chairmen and representatives of other Faculties. The General Committee is responsible for the formulation of policy for the Faculty of Arts and Science. It is concerned, for example, with curriculum development, admissions policy, study abroad programmes, and evaluation policy, and determines the regulations governing the length of the academic session and day. It also serves as a forum for discussion of any matters of general concern to the Faculty, from which resolutions may be sent to other bodies, including the Governing Council of the University. Some student members of the General Committee are elected directly to it (2 from each College and 3 part-time students, giving a total of 17). The remainder assume their seats automatically upon election to one of the five Curriculum Committees; or the Committee on Counselling, or Study Elsewhere. Membership on all Committees is normally for a two-year renewable term.

There are five curriculum committees: Humanities, Social Sciences, Physical Sciences, Life Sciences and Interdisciplinary Studies, the last of which is also responsible for various special courses in the Faculty. Each committee is chaired by an Associate Dean and has 3 full-time students, 1 part-time student, and 6 faculty members. These committees review all course proposals submitted by Departments for inclusion in the Calendar, and may take initiative in proposing development of new areas of study and any other matters pertaining to the course offerings.

The Counselling Committee has 1 student member from each College, 1 part-time student, and 4 faculty members. The Chairman will be appointed from among the members. This committee is responsible for co-ordination of counselling for undergraduates in Arts and Science and for secondary school students interested in eventually entering the Faculty. While many individuals and offices on the campus are involved in counselling of one kind, or another, students all too often do not receive the information and advice which they need at critical points during their years at the University.

The Committee on Study Elsewhere supervises the arrangements through which students in the Faculty may spend a year abroad to facilitate their studies in certain disciplines. It will have four full-time student and four faculty members. The Chairman will be appointed from among the members.

In addition there is an Academic Standards Committee, a Committee on Standing, and an Admissions Committee. Appointed faculty and ex-officio persons will sit on these committees.

A list of positions that are open has been published in the University media and is available at the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall, College and Departmental offices and the APUS office. In addition, a complete description of the structure of the Council and the accompanying rules of procedure may be obtained on request from the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall.

NOMINATIONS OPENED FEBRUARY 4

Full-time and part-time students registered in the Faculty of Arts and Science are eligible for nomination to the following committees: General Committee, Committee on Study Elsewhere, Counselling Committee, curriculum Committee on Humanities, curriculum Committee on Interdisciplinary Studies, curriculum Committee on Life Sciences, curriculum Committee on Physical Sciences, curriculum Committee on Social Sciences. For nomination to a curriculum committee, other than Interdisciplinary Studies, a full-time student must be intending to take at least three courses within the group in the next academic year.

Nominations opened on February 4. Nomination forms may then be obtained at the Faculty Office, College Registrar's offices or Departmental offices, and the APUS office. Completed nomination forms must be returned to the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall prior to 4.00 p.m. February 15th to be valid. Voting will be by ballot box. Enquiries regarding this election may be directed to 928-3389 or 928-3392.

Women's volleyball team loses in Challenge Cup finals

By PAT DARTFORD

Earlier this season, the University of Toronto women's volleyball team captured the first Challenge Cup. This past weekend at York in the second Challenge Cup, they had hopes of repeating their previous victory. Unfortunately, the Blues were not the better team on the court as the black and gold of Waterloo came away with the first place honours.

Toronto began the tournament play with games against Guelph, Waterloo, and Wilfrid Laurier on Friday. The Blues started in winning fashion defeating Guelph 15-1, 15-13. Their second opponents, Waterloo got off to a quick start and took the first game 15-8. The Toronto squad with a solid effort from all six members rallied to reverse the outcome of game one, taking Waterloo 15-4 and tying the match. It seemed inevitable that this contest would be repeated in the final stages of the tournament.

The next volleyball encounter against a small Wilfrid Laurier team proved to be little trouble for the Blues as they ended Friday's play with 15-7, 15-1 wins.

Throughout the six games during the first day, noticeable individual efforts by Shaughn Renahan, Frances Walmsley, and Mary Drakich contributed to the team's determined play and success.

Following Friday's competition, McMaster was alone in first place and undefeated, but Saturday morning, the big Blue team handed Mac their first losses with 15-8, 15-10 scores. Marion Thomson's alert setting coupled with Judie Trevelyan's varied spiking and tipping led Toronto's attack.

Following the McMaster victory, the Blue team ended scheduled play with a spirited Windsor team providing a tough battle. When the two games concluded, Toronto had fought hard to earn 15-10, 15-8 victories.

The semi-finals, a two out of three contest, paired Toronto with Queen's and Waterloo with McMaster. Waterloo took Mac easily in two straight games, while Toronto found Queen's a tough opponent.

In the first game, Queen's pushed the Blues to the limit, but the U of T team came through with a 16-14 win. Half of Toronto's points were successful serves by Marion Thomson. But, by the second game, the fire had gone out in the Queen's attack and Toronto won 15-2.

It was the Toronto-Waterloo showdown in the finals that provided a Cinderella story on the volleyball court. The Blues struck quickly in game one with Heli Kaur serving five consecutive points for an early lead.

It was 14-6 when the tide changed and the Waterloo Athenas proceeded to rally in an amazing comeback. As the Blues struggled to win one serve, Waterloo successfully put 10 points on the scoreboard and a 16-14 victory.

With such a psychological lift in Waterloo's favour, the second game was a difficult one for the Blues from the very beginning. Despite Irene Hammerich's and Mary Drakich's blocking attempts, Waterloo dominated the play.

At one point, Toronto pulled within two points and appeared to be on the verge of a comeback. However, the black and gold reached the magic 15 first. The 15-11 victory gave Waterloo the second Challenge Cup championship. Mention should be made of the efforts of Jane Nixon, Peggy Duff, Valerie Long, and Irene Berceky, who came off the bench in pressure situations and came through with admirable performances.

Next weekend, Toronto ventures to Ottawa for the eastern division sectionals. If they get by them, they probably will meet the powerful Waterloo squad again in the OWIAA finals for a grudge match.

Toronto gymnasts capture first

By BRYAN ALCOCK

Double Olympian Steve Mitruk led the Toronto men's gymnastics team to a first place team victory at the McMaster University invitational gym meet. This was Toronto's best showing in many years as they scored 209.6 points to slip past second place York, the perennial CIAU champs, who scored 206.55. Eight teams attended the meet with 36 competitors in all. However, it was clearly a two team battle as Toronto and York far outclassed their competition as witnessed by McMaster's third place score of 166.95 points.

First place all around went to Steve Mitruk who took first on high bar, parallel bars, free exercise and second on side horse, rings and vault to give him a 52.15 score.

Hans Frick of Toronto placed third all round scoring 48.10. Keith Carter of the University of Manitoba was second all around with 51.45.

Other all around scores for Toronto were John Fair 37.55, Rick Jeysmen 36.50, and Brian Elder 34.95 placing them 10th, 11th and 12th respectively. John Kelly scored 24.80 over five events. Other members of the team did not compete as only six members per team were allowed.

This marks the end of the invitational season and sets the stage for the OUA finals. Both York and Toronto now enter the semi-finals of their respective sections this weekend. The top two teams from each will meet in the finals at York on Feb. 23.

Blues drill Western 7 - 4 in rough game

By PAUL CARSON

The hockey Blues raced to an early 3-0 lead and went on to defeat Western Mustangs 7-4 in a rough and occasionally crude OUA A inter-sectional game Monday before about 2400 fans in London.

The victory was Blues fifteenth straight this year and extends their unbeaten record in league play to 37 consecutive games. The team's last loss was to Laurentian late in the 1971-72 season. The loss leaves Western at 9-4 and still tied with Waterloo atop the western division.

The large ice surface in London puts a premium on accurate passing and disciplined positional play, usually making for fast-skating and wide-open style of play. However, Mustangs chose to adopt a heavy bodychecking style right from the opening faceoff, and when Blues retaliated the game quickly resembled a wierd combination of football and fencing.

Lax officiating allowed the players to get completely out of control and by the second period both teams were slashing, charging and tripping almost at will. The chippy play finally descended into outright brutality when Western's Gord Sutherland deliberately smashed Varsity defenceman Brent Swanick over the head with his stick late in the third period. Swanick had carried the puck into the Mustangs' zone and turned to skate back to his position when Sutherland attacked him from behind.

As Swanick lay dazed on the ice, several Varsity players threatened to gain instant revenge while Sutherland skated to the penalty box. He was assessed a five-minute major for highsticking.

Swanick had been temporarily injured earlier in the game from an errant Western elbow, while center Ivan McFarlane may miss several games after taking a wicked two-handed slash on his left arm and shoulder. Defenceman Rick Cornacchia was also carved by a Western highstick, and several other Blues were sporting cuts and bruises after the game.

Blues were also forced to play the final two periods without defensive leader Warren Anderson as the Varsity captain was ejected along with Western center Gary Coons following an old-fashioned bare knuckle fight at 17:38 of the first period.

Anderson had given Blues a 1-0 lead at 6:02 when he skated through the entire Western team to beat goaltender Bruce Steffler while Stangs' Mike O'Neill was serving one of his three high-sticking penalties.

About a minute later, O'Neill was back in the penalty box and Blues power play clicked again as Ron Harris converted a perfect pass from Doug Herridge.

Don Pagnutti upped the count to 3-0 at 8:41 by neatly deflecting a point shot from Rick Cornacchia. It was the start of a good evening for both players as Pagnutti gained five points while Cornacchia replaced Anderson on the regular defensive rotation and played his best game in a Varsity uniform.

Coons narrowed the score to 3-1 before engaging Anderson in their senseless fight.

McFarlane whipped in a quick 25-footer at 2:16 of the middle period but Blues then fell into their usual sloppy defensive habits and soon ran into some mysterious penalty calls as well.

Netminder Bob Oss made a series of excellent saves but finally Dave Roy scored Western's second goal while Blues were two men short.

Many dirty checks later, Pagnutti gave Blues some breathing space by firing Bill Hews' rebound past Steffler at 18:37. Cornacchia also gained an assist as his accurate pass from the point started the play.

Street thugs, take cover!

The teams continued to concentrate on bump-and-grind hockey with inaccurate passing and hurried shooting spoiling most of the good scoring chances. Blues held a 20-14 edge in shots after forty minutes and ended the game ahead 33-26.

Pesky Dave Edwards beat Oss on a breakaway at 3:22 of the final period and Stangs continued to press until Larry Hopkins fired a hard shot between Steffler's legs just as the Varsity rookie was being flattened by a Western defenceman.

Al Milnes collected Blues' final goal when Steffler couldn't hold his long shot during Sutherland's penalty. Western captain Peter Fraser concluded the scoring on another breakaway in the final 90 seconds.

It was, on balance, a needlessly crude and silly type of game from two teams who can, and should, play better.

Blues next outing is the exhibition game against Sir George Williams at the Arena Friday night at 8 pm.

Tenants will pay repairs: Joyce

By BOB BETTSON

Former Crown Trust vice-president James Joyce said Wednesday part of the reason for Innis co-op tenants getting a CMHC loan for renovating the houses on 16-24 Sussex avenue is to bring the university-owned houses up to standard.

Crown Trust has been administering the U of T owned houses on the North campus. Crown Trust and U of T have neglected to complete all the repairs ordered by the city Housing Standards Department on July 31.

Joyce was speaking to a meeting of the Business Affairs committee of which he is chairman.

U of T property administrator Keil Gregory told the committee all repairs on the houses would not be done leaving Innis Tenants with the responsibility for making the repairs.

The city housing standards bylaw requires the landlord, and specifically not the tenants, to be responsible for making whatever repairs are needed to bring a house up to minimum standards.

In fact, the provincial Landlord Tenant Act allows tenants to withhold rent—under certain carefully described rules—if the landlord does not make required repairs.

Gregory, under questioning from student governor Howard Levitt, said the repairs are to be picked up on the renovations.

He qualified this by adding "if Innis doesn't finish the repairs we will."

He quoted Innis principal Peter Russell as saying it was not sensible to do the work if it was going to be redone anyway.

The Joyce admission came as no surprise after the length of the U of T delay in repairing the houses. The Innis Housing Co-op will thus have to pay for the repairs.

The Innis corporation is made up of students and families from the community, who will now have to pay for the repairs.

U of T parking policy also came under fire from divergent points of view. The five point policy passed by the internal affairs committee was approved.

This policy calls for improved public transit, permits based on need, construction of below ground parking structures and continuation of parking fees on a break even basis.

The land for U of T parking, 9.5 acres, has an estimated worth of $28.5 million. One proposal is to have all costs, including land costs, covered by parking fees to cover all economic costs.

However there was conflict over a possible increase in parking rates. Optical businessman Sydney Hermant said there should be no parking fees on campus. He said it was unprecedented for a corporation to charge its employees for its own private lot.

However alumnus William Broadhurst and business professor W.B. Coutts said an increase should be made in line with city council's desire to restrict driving downtown.

Coutts said while charging market rates would be "ideal," these were too much. However he felt present rates were "unrealistic" and advocated an increase.

Internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway said her main desire is to improve public transit especially for those who are travelling from suburban areas who spend a long time commuting.

She said the present parking policy had been used as a basis for the choice of housing and it would be unfair to change it.

Present rates are $12 a month for reserved spaces and $6 a month for unreserved spaces. This compares to $1.50 to $2.50 a day downtown.

President John Evans said he was concerned on a "sensitive" issue such as parking a great deal of care should be taken to create understanding in the university community.

The committee received for information a number of reports on bu-business dealings of the university. The most significant was a report on the 1974-5 and 1975-6 capital projects for which provincial funding is being requested — a total of about $6 million in 1974-5 and $9 million in 1975-6.

Erindale complaints on salary too late

By ELEANOR SIMPSON

Despite U of T's intention to give salaries top priority in budgeting, an attempt to add a cost-of-living escalator to Erindale support staff salaries has apparently failed.

One reason for the university's inability to grant the request was the timing of the staff petition, according to R.F. Brown, director of the personnel department.

The petition, signed by 79 support staff—non-union, non-academic—and 69 members of the academic staff, reached the business affairs budget committee after the last date for such submissions and just prior to the release of budget allocations, Brown said.

Brown also claimed escalator type clauses are simply not feasible given the university's budget mechanisms. The university thinks it is faced with less than adequate operating income from the provincial government.

The government has set a minimum five per cent increase in the basic income unit for 1974-75.

A recent budget committee report stated: "The increase represents, in effect, a substantial reduction in real operating income available." Faced with a major increase in the cost of most services, it is impossible for the university to maintain the same level of service as in 1973-74.

"The effect of current government policy is to increase greatly the pressure on the university's already limited resources."

Brown felt the petition was misleading as its calculations were based on the minimum increase of past years and did not use the average increase allocation.

The petition read as follows: "The per cent index for the 'cost of living' increase is rising rapidly. According to Statistics Canada, the index rose 2.9 per cent in 1971, 4.8 per cent in 1972, and is projected at 7.5 per cent in 1973."

The Erindale petition continued: "With a minimum salary increase of 3.5 per cent and a maximum allowed for this past year of 6.5 per cent, it is obvious that we are losing ground, since very few employees are granted maximum increases."

"In August, 1973, consumer prices were 8.3 per cent higher than they were in August, 1972, and food costs for the same period rose 16.2 per cent."

"Household operating costs are 6.8 per cent higher than they were a year ago. Even fresh produce, usually lower in price in the late summer, was 37 per cent higher than at the same time last year."

"Since low-salary employees—(and most support staff fall into this category)—have to spend most of their income on survival items such as food, clothing, shelter and transportation, it is painfully clear that our monetary position is deteriorating in spite of the small yearly salary increases..."

"...The cost of living increase would have to drop below one per cent if the 1975 salary is to match the 1975 cost of living!"

"On the other hand the salary increase will have to be between 5 per cent and 13 per cent to match the predicted cost of living figures..."

"For people in low wage categories, the cost of living figures quoted are optimistic because such a preponderance of their income must be spent on subsistence items whose rates of increase are rising faster than rates for nonessential items."

The business affairs budget committee report recommended the following:

An allocation for the ten-month cost of salary increases to non-unionized; non academic staff of $2,077,000 for St. George Campus, $110,000 for Scarborough College, acd81021) for Erindale College.

"The funds recommended are intended to cover changes in salary scales to follow changes in salaries outside the university, advances through the salary structure in each salary grade and some remaining special provision for adjustment of anomalies in individual cases."

For academic staff these were the recommendations:

The salaries of continuing full-time members of the academic staff be increased across-the-board by seven per cent in the 1974-75 fiscal year.

The salary levels of all part-time, junior and other academic staff also be increased across-the-board by seven per cent in 1974-75.

The committee's report estimated the overall average salary increase to be about 9.8 per cent. For individual members of the academic staff, average total increases—including a career advancement component—vary from about 14 per cent at the low end of the salary structure to about 8.3 per cent at the $30,000 level.

Universities to face worse crisis: Macdonald

By RANDY ROBERTSON

The president-elect of York University, and the present deputy treasurer of Ontario, Ian Macdonald, warned yesterday the financial hardships universities are now facing will not relax throughout the 70s and the situation will get worse before it gets better.

Macdonald, addressing the Empire Club at the Royal York on the question "Universities: who needs them?", attributed his "austere forecast" to the constitutional division of responsibilities between Ottawa and the provinces.

"So long as the constitutional responsibilities of our Confederation remain intact, and the revenue sources among the three levels remain unreformed, then education and a variety of other socially desirable activities in this province will face financial hardship."

The Ontario government, Macdonald said, has been faced in recent years "with massive deficits and cash requirements far in excess, relatively, of those of the federal government.

"At the same time, massive new demands are arising within the constitutional umbrella of provincial governments."

Macdonald cited environmental protection, mass urban transit, preservation of agricultural land, development of recreation and open space, urban renewal and beautification as all competing with education, health and the traditional social services for provincial funds.

But Macdonald, referred to at the meeting as "the Ontario Government's principal mandarin," also said when he becomes York president July 1, he will suffer "from self-inflicted wounds in view of certain policies of the Ontario government with which I have been associated."

Ontario premier William Davis' commitment to preserve the Niagara escarpment and to provide a parkway belt from Hamilton to Oshawa around Metropolitan Toronto will involve an outlay of at least $1 billion over the next few years "and more to come."

Macdonald noted as well the Ontario government is committed to major transfers of money to the municipal level of government to offset the municipal level's sole dependence on "the regressive property tax."

Macdonald said the only resolution to the dilemma is "acceptance of the necessary discipline to reach agreement on strict priorities, a willingness to set goals and objectives, and the ability to concentrate on those things that matter most."

If we face a choice between lower library budgets or more educational television then surely we must be prepared to decide."

U of T chose to build the Robarts library at a cost of $3 million dollars. As a result that library's book budget has recently been cut.

Macdonald suggested universities co-operate sufficiently to avoid wasteful competition "without at the same time becoming an educational cartel."

That the universities decide on those programs and activities that should be their priorities and that they concentrate on them; that the universities have a sufficiently clear medium-term financial plan to avoid unnecessary emergency situations, and that the universities since they want a bigger share of the public's financial pie, work to convince the public they deserve its support and they are relevant to our society.

Macdonald warned universities have recently been concerned too much with wrestling with questions of internal structure, and here have risked seeming irrelevant to the communities in which they exist.

"Much of the vitality of universities has been sapped in resolving the process of how to do things, rather in deciding what to do."

Noting that debates over structure are always easier than setting goals and objectives, Macdonald said: "Constitutions and university structures are creatures of man, the product of an act of will, and vehicles to help us reach our destination."

"Let them not become a preoccupation or an end in themselves."

"Let us create something that works and not spend too long over it in order to tackle our primary responsibilities."

The primary responsibility of the university today, Macdonald said, is to preserve its essential values as it participates more in the wider 'University of the World.'

"The university as an institution must recognize that it is a central part, but still only a part, of a variety of centers of knowledge and learning business, government, resource institutes, community colleges, and so on."

"Still it is a special star in the intellectual constellation and should be a guiding light."

"To do so, however, it must earn its place of leadership. To do that, in turn it must not only know itself, but know and understand intimately the world and conditions around it."

Macdonald called for openness and mobility between the various parts of the 'new university' and the broad community.

"Organizations which behave as secret societies must bring suspicion and mistrust upon themselves."

"Let us open up our institutions let everyone see what we are doing let the professor know the actual problems of the corporate suite, the businessmen the true constraints of the Cabinet room, the person in government the real objectives of the university."

Papandreou charges Nato, US aid colonels

A "wave of terror" was used to suppress last November's student uprising in Greece, said Papandreou.

By MARGARET ROBERTSON
Andreas Papandreou said NATO tanks and police trained by US specialists "unleashed a wave of terror" in order to keep the Greek government from toppling during last November's student uprising.

He described the unarmed revolt as "unique in Europe" and not to be compared with student uprisings elsewhere.

The students occupied most of Athens, controlled radio stations and public buildings, set up a method of government and came "very close" to bringing down the regime before "at least 400" people were killed in the final bloody stages.

Papandreou, a former Greek cabinet minister and now a professor of economics at York University, made the remarks at the first of a series of Wednesday night lectures sponsored by the "Committee for a Marxist Institute."

Papandreou came to Canada after spending a short time in prison following the 1967 military coup which overthrew the government.

This is his second exile from Greece. He was arrested and imprisoned for underground resistance work during the 30's and subsequently went to the US, where he taught at Harvard and several other prominent universities for a number of years.

He returned to Greece in 1959 to embark on his ill-fated government career. He remains politically active in Canada, however, as leader of the panhellenic Liberation Movement.

Papandreou blamed American presence in Greece for the oppression of the Greek people, calling the civil war "the first Vietnam."

He said the civil war was fought for national independence by a majority of Greeks and ended in defeat because of American intervention in 1947 and 1948.

He said there are 30,000 American and NATO officers and men currently "circulating" in Greece.

Napalm bombs were tested there, he told his overflow audience, and the CIA "was built in Greece."

That is where they learned to "penetrate and corrupt," according to Papandreou.

During this period the American influence was able to penetrate the state machinery.

After the war, the Americans faced the problem of how to make Greece safe for investment. The US poured an estimated $1 million per day into the country for ten years after the war, he said.

"They didn't use to be as subtle as they are today," commented Papandreou.

The national product increased 56 per cent but wages did not improve. The colonels who came to power in 1967 in what Papandreou described as an American imperial military dictatorship based on a NATO plan, faced the same problem.

He said wages have been kept low by allowing the countryside to wither. While Greece is generally thought of as being primarily agricultural, in actual fact most of the food is imported.

"You know the Greek cheese you buy in Toronto?" he asked. "The Greeks import it, too!"

Only the very old or very young are to be found in the countryside. The able-bodied surplus labor is to be found "working in the factories of Germany" or on Athens streets looking for jobs.

He said one third of Greeks now alive are living outside Greece.

The inflation rate for last year was officially given as 30 per cent, but Papandreou feels this is conservative and that the actual figure is about 40 per cent.

The junta which came to power last year is "merely a change of guard," in Papandreou's opinion. The prime minister was appointed by America, he said. Next time he probably will not even speak Greek!

Papandreou said this is not a fascist regime in that it has no social base except possibly in the 5 per cent of the population related to foreign capital. This was made especially evident by the student-worker confrontation.

There will be other confrontations, he predicted, and the fight promises to be long and "quite costly." November proved that it needs to be an armed struggle with a "distinct socialist form."

The movement has penetrated the minds of the Greeks, he added. "There are limits to how long the Greek army can be used to oppress the Greek people."

The committee hopes to generate enough interest through the lecture series to enable them to set up a "rigorously non-partisan" institute which would be open to all radicals regardless of ideology, but would be Marxist in orientation.

Two candidates running for GSU president

Graduate students will be voting starting Monday for a successor to Cliff Watson, Graduate Student Union president who tendered his resignation last month.

Two candidates have stepped forward to vie for the post of interim president, which is to expire at the end of what would have been the end of Watson's term of office, April 30. Both candidates stopped off at the Varsity to discuss the issues as they see them.

ALF CHAITON

Alf Chaiton sees the election as a cross-roads for the GSU.

Chaiton sees the choice before grad students to direct the GSU into the political sphere or to preserve the GSU as solely a social club.

He comes down on the side of widening the role of the GSU into a group which not only provides a social atmosphere but lobbies on behalf of grad students at both the university and provincial government level.

Chaiton points to the creation of the Grad Post, the financing of the Graduate Assistants Association and the GSU's student income survey as beginnings this year of what he hopes could be built into more GSU participation in affairs affecting grad students.

He opposes decentralization of the GSU because in the past grad students have been unable to express their interests as a group and a decentralized structure would leave them no voice in expressing their views.

An organized GSU, Chaiton says, would be able to lobby in favor of grad students.

Chaiton says the GSU has historically reacted to crisis situations and has as a result developed no coherent policies for the students the GSU must represent.

Instead, Chaiton wants to use a ten-week tenure as GSU president to draw together the GSU structure into what he hopes will be an organization capable of getting grad students better involved in decision making affecting them.

GEORGE PARAKULAM

The first point of George Parakulam's platform is to decentralize the GSU power structure and give it to course unions.

Parakulam says he does not think there is enough grass roots interest for the GSU to begin any lobbying campaigns at this time.

Instead, he says, there should be an emphasis on course unions.

Along with the decentralization, Parakulam wants to see the GSU pool resources with such groups as the Graduate Assistants Association, the undergraduates' Students' Administrative Council, the Black Student Union and the Women's Caucus.

Parakulam wants to see grad students get interested in the community around them.

As he states it: "Attempts will be taken to get the interested graduate student to take part in the communal life of his/her socio-political milieu."

He says he would like to see the GSU set up meetings with community groups around campus so grad students could go out and "become aware of the life about them."

The GSU, under his direction, would set up a national graduate journal, a publication Parakulam describes as being a journal of social and literary criticism.

He says it would be run by a board elected by the GSU general council with the Grad Post editor sitting on the board as executive editor of the board. This national journal would be supported by the GSU, Parakulam says.

By MARINA STRAUSS

Twenty-one former students of dismissed mathematics professor Stephen Salaff challenge university president John Evans' criticism of Salaff's teaching abilities.

In a letter to Evans this week, the students say "again we must clearly state that we, as students, consider Stephen Salaff to be an excellent teacher."

This assertion comes as a response to a letter Evans sent to Students' Administrative Council president Bob Anderson in December.

Evans told Anderson information from the math department shows evidence which would dispute Anderson's contentions of the excellence of Salaff's teaching.

Mathematics department chairman George Duff dismissed Salaff last year.

The future of the former part-time professor's U of T teaching career hangs in limbo as he awaits the possibility of an appeal.

Last March students occupied the math department offices after Salaff was notified of his firing and two other popular math professors were denied tenure.

In their February 4 letter, the students again confirm "the widely held opinions concerning the teaching ability of Stephen Salaff."

"These opinions were already amply demonstrated by the students of his class (MAT 110) to the math department last year and are stated once more in the math and physics students' course union evaluation booklet '72-73," the students continue

There were a number of misleading statements in the Wed. February 6 story. "Proposals for Honors degrees defeated." The outline implied the professors standing defeated the proposal for honors degrees.

In fact, they were in favor of a defeated amendment to the honors proposals submitted. Also the headline implied proposals were defeated. In fact, only one amendment submitted by Professor D.J. Conacher (Classics) was defeated.

The lead implies the motion for an honors program was defeated. In reality only the amendment to a proposal was defeated as well as an attempt to refer all proposals by Dean Bob Greene.

Evans double clutches on parking policy

U of T for once doesn't want to assume an elitist role, but this time it's to everyone's disadvantage. Our fair university which claims to strive so hard for excellence and quality apparently doesn't care enough about the city that surrounds it to want to reduce its parking spaces.

In fact, the university is even thinking of constructing new parking structures which are somewhat concealed from view.

But the crunch will probably come at the February 18 meeting of the city public works committee when Ward 9 alderwoman Dorothy Thomas decides to haul U of T onto the carpet for its poor attitude.

Thomas justifiably feels "the university must be made aware of its responsibilities." She said "if they're (the university) not willing to co-operate, what we'll have to do is ask Metro and the provincial government to let us have control over all parking, both public and private in the university area."

We sincerely hope Metro follows through. The university has demonstrated that it acts in its own self-interest unless somebody or something comes down hard onto it—city council might be just the thing.

Thomas also termed U of T's actions "arrogant."

Once again, she's right. We seen enough of this university's actions to realize she could follow through a lot further on her statements.

For example, "arrogant" John Evans, sometime president of this institution, told the city-university liaison committee November 12 U of T will not "unilaterally reduce" the number of parking spaces on the St. George campus unless City Hall moves to restrict downtown parking.

Evans also said: "If the municipality moved to reduce parking, we will follow. But we will not unilaterally reduce parking if transit is not adequate."

Evans' attitude is indicative of U of T policy and Australian-born Jill Conway (vice-president, internal affairs) and the business affairs committee have meekly submitted to Evans' will.

We think Waltzing Matilda should come down off the ceiling and realize that the U of T parking policy which she and Campus Services Coordinator Lois Reimer drafted is wholly inadequate for changing circumstances.

Conway's specific proposal is that "the university develop plans, possibly in co-operation with others such as the government of Ontario, Ontario Hydro, major hospitals, for the construction of parking facilities wherever possible below grade to reduce the number of scattered surface parking lots."

No dice, Miss Conway. Toronto's public works department requested the university over seven months ago to raise its rates to discourage the number of cars downtown.

Evans, in effect, has told the city to fuck off.

Alderman Colin Vaughn has also brought out some relevant data on the university and its transportation "problems."

For one, "U of T has the best transit in the city," according to Vaughn. Alderman William Kilbourn also suggested to business affairs vice-president Alex Rankin that the university should spell out exactly which transit lines are inadequate at which hours of the day so city council could request improvements from the TTC.

As far as we know, the university hasn't been willing to

AN OPEN LETTER TO PEOPLE WHO PARK THEIR CARS IN DOWNTOWN TORONTO

Because of a great deal of public confusion about a decision to change our policy regarding long-term parking in our downtown municipal parking garages, we would like to restate the facts and the reason for our decision.

1. Parking rates are not going up. Per hour and half-hour rates now posted on all Parking Authority lots and garages will remain the same.
2. The decision to eliminate monthly parking and to remove the limit on the maximum charge applies only to the downtown parking garages at Nathan Phillips Square and at Queen & Victoria Sts.
3. Only about 25% of all motorists who park in these garages will be affected—approximately 400 people. Seventy-five per cent of the motorists using these garages park for five hours or less and therefore will not be affected.

The new policy is designed to accommodate the growing numbers of short-term parkers and to discourage the all-day parker who is one of the prime causes of rush hour congestion on our major traffic arteries.

We welcome your comments and suggestions.

discuss these problems in the past.

We think it's about time the university stopped playing games with the city. We're not impressed by either Conway's or Evans' arguments.

They smack of more John Evans-liberal slime, and we're tired of it.

As the advertisement on this page indicates, the city is taking some steps to discourage parking. Evans has already said he's willing to play follow the leader. Well, here's his chance.

RMG 'splits' over discipline

The discipline code steering committee was formed by several groups and individuals on campus who wanted a united campaign of all those students who were opposed to the Conway-Cadario Code of Behaviour. The campaign mounted was able to make some gains - the Governing Council has not yet been able to implement the Code.

However, it has become increasingly clear that the basis of unity of the committee-repeal the code-is a very loose thread which is no longer a viable basis for a united committee. This is because some members of the Steering Committee—notably the representatives of SAC and the GSU, have for the past several weeks entered into negotiations with the administration in an attempt to find a compromise agreement for an amended code. This has served to undermine the position of the steering committee and the students it was able to mobilize in their struggle with the administration. It is very difficult to convince anyone that you are fighting for repeal and will accept nothing less, when everyone knows you have been involved in backroom deals for "mutually agreeable" compromise.

Because the SAC representatives remain in the committee which is united around repeal and at the same time continue to negotiate with the administration, the basis of unity of the steering committee is no longer real. Support for repeal and support for negotiations are contradictory and mutually exclusive positions. For this reason the Revolutionary Marxist Group will no longer participate in steering committee meetings. We consider the actions of the SAC representatives totally unacceptable. We challenge them to debate at their choice of time and place with us the best methods for carrying the discipline campaign forward.

The RMG stands on its position of no to any code. Amendments to the present code, or even a completely different code will not change its basic purpose. The reason for having a code is to stifle student dissent on campus in future struggles against upcoming cutbacks and their ramifications in universities. Student negotiators who argue we need a code that will protect students against the unfair practices of the university, a code which will "redistribute power" fail to understand the basic purpose of this code. They ignore the relationship between the nature of the university and the nature of the class society it serves.

We look forward to working with all those persons and groups interested in mobilizing for the March Governing Council meeting to demand they Repeal the Code.

Bliss' code word plagiarism

I am still not sure whether to judge Dr. Mike Bliss' views on tenure, as reported in Monday's Varsity, amusing or a joke. However he does raise some interesting and thorny problems.

Take for instance the problem of who is qualified to judge the quality of a person's academic work. It would seem that Dr. Bliss' doctoral committee found his "contribution to knowledge" a worthy one. At least they granted him a degree.

However, a good number of students of business and economic history who have some knowledge of the period Bliss covered have judged his work unworthy. Some feel the techniques he developed while ghosting for Pierre Berton's epic on railways (see Berton's devastating acknowledgement in his tape recorder and to Mike Bliss to see Berton's evaluation of his role) were put to liberal use in his thesis. Thus, we have dramas of downtrodden grocers and jewellers used as social, intellectual and emotional background to the sympathetic portrayal of the cartellization of the Canadian economy by monopoly capitalists. Many have found the main interpretations for the thesis to be more palatable to the Flavell family, for whom Bliss is now preparing a glorious biography, than the intellectual community. So, the judgemental qualifications of even the most learned professors can be doubted.

There may also be a conflict of interest in Bliss' choice of his judges. Bliss is not the history department's answer to Erlichman but still, one feels uneasy that people who have gained prestige and money from publishing in his Canadian Social Documents series will be among the leading casters of votes on his stature.

In all, the academic world is not all that Bliss supposes it to be in his letter. It would seem that a student or two would not gravely endanger the sanctity of U of T's hardly virgin walls.

Hector must be fired

Ideas have consequences, someone once said, but the academic freedom fighters don't seem to have grasped the point. Were Dr. Ian Hector an eccentric bigot with no influence and following, his theory that Italians are "culturally predisposed" to fake injury would be of no concern. But "Hectorism" has its following in the medical profession, it is more than just a matter of ideas. It must be stopped. Hector must be fired, and this ideological virus eradicated.

While petitioning against Hector, SDS members were shocked to meet medical students who defend the notion that Italians are fakers or cry babies. "The Mediterranean syndrome" one student called it, and described it as acknowledged fact. "You see, you've got it too," she told an Italian student who tried to argue with her. Others told us they have been taught, "If an Italian comes in and claims he's dying, send him home with two aspirins."

This is more than just "ideas". Doctors who accept these racist lies will carry them out in practice. In some cases, they will mean the difference between life and death. Suppose two women have been hit by a car and are rushed to emergency at Toronto Western Hospital? One is English, the other Italian. Who gets treated first? Who gets most attention? Does the doctor discard the Italian woman's complaints as hypochondria? This is not "theory", it is fact. If the academic freedom fighters want evidence of the cost in human suffering of Hector's theory about Italians, walk through Toronto's west end and "knock on any door". Hector's own report on Giuseppe Pulera, that resulted in him being assigned $93 per month (less than Hector charges for one hour of shrinking), proves "ideas have consequences".

Evans has tried to protect Hector by distinguishing between his well-documented work at the compensation board and his teaching. But it is the university administration that has claimed there is more to holding a university job than just teaching. Last year three math Profs were fired because they didn't publish; that is, they didn't engage in work outside the university in order to keep their jobs. The principle is, presumably, that professors are hired as scholars and professionals, and not as teachers. And Hector has shown by his practice that he is unqualified, a pseudoscientist.

Many medical students refused to sign the Hector petitions, not because they disagreed, but because it would harm their professional status. Academic freedom? John Grohova of Il Giornale di Toronto was not permitted to mention Hector's name in the Governing Council because it might be libellous. Please enlighten us as to how libel can be an offence if there is "academic freedom". Hector has the "academic freedom" to call Italians "culturally predisposed" to fake injuries, but an Italian doesn't have the "academic freedom" to call him names without risking a law suit. Academic freedom? Phooey.

Hector is not an isolated individual, he is part of a whole school of social scientists. Edward Banfield's book The Moral Basis of a Backward Society, of which there are 21 copies in the Wallace room, required reading in History 341, recommended reading in many other courses, is a major and widely used sociology text with the theme that southern Italians are "amoral". Banfield's Unheavenly City, used by political science Professor Silcox claims "Cultural differences (apart from class-cultural differences) - and conceivably biological ones as well - also account in some degree for the special position of the Negro."

The 1973 Nobel Prize for Medicine giveaway to Konrad Lorenz ought to give people shivers. Lorenz, former head of psychology at Konigsberg University wrote in 1943:

"civilized peoples must inevitably perish unless self-conscious scientifically based race politics prevents it. Such politics are based on the... tenets of the National Socialistische Arbeiter Partei." Lorenz shares the honours this year with another famous academic, ex-Professor Kissinger, the B-52 peacemaker.

Lorenz, Kissinger, Jensen, Ezra Pound, Shockley, Banfield and Hector are high on the protected list of the academic freedom fighters. Academic freedom fighters like to call us left-wing McCarthy's, but they were nowhere to be found in 1952. Hundreds of radical professors were fired or persecuted without a whimper from these heroes of free speech.

Academic freedom does not exist, nor should it! Sometimes you have to burn books in order to prevent burning people. The battle of ideas is not a game. The money and prestige of the university should be used to fight racism, not to aid and encourage it. Fire Hector.

Racist theories can't be proved empirically

In reply to Mr. Gibbons' article (Monday Jan. 28), I would first like to state that he is being extremely naive. He says that racist theories can only be proved or disproved by scientific evidence. Mr. Gibbons, there is no way in this world that you will find such empirical evidence proving a racist theory.

As far as the old statement that Hector has the right to free speech let me state that man is not free to bring forth injury upon any other individual or set of individuals. Even John Locke (hardly a communist) espouses this.

Ian Hector, through his teaching of bad medicine i.e., that Italians are "culturally pre-disposed to play a sick role," is a very dangerous man.

SDS has evidence, which will be brought forth, that such allegations have been made in his class.

In closing, I ask Mr. Gibbons if one should allow himself to be beaten into the ground by another? The answer is no! Therefore, we cannot allow Hector to teach future medical students the inequality of Italians, thus attempting to beat them into the ground.

Judge merits on South Africa

I would like to offer a few thoughts and observations on the letters which have appeared in the Varsity of late criticizing my views on South Africa.

It seems pointless for me to amass yet another batch of facts and figures to continue the battle of the decimal point. Both sides have presented their case, it is now time for each individual who has been following the debate with an open mind to weigh the relative merits of the statistics, opinions, ideas and credibilities of the several "combatants". This is how it should be. Unfortunately, and this brings me to my next point, this is not the way my opponents would have it. They are not, it seems, content to allow the students of this university to come to decisions on the basis of a courteous and civilized exchange of views. They seem to feel it necessary to indulge in the most scurrilous invective and demand that my opinions be suppressed.

The worst possible implication that can be read into my letters is that I feel some of my opponents' facts are inaccurate and that they themselves are less than tolerant. In return I have been called a liar, a propagandist, a racist, a feeble-minded fool and a Nazi. While it can be surmised from my letters that I am in favour of a full discussion of the South African question, opposing letters have broadly hinted that the Varsity should not allow letters to be printed which could be labelled pro-South African government. Indeed the letter of Mr. Sider and Ms. Fulmer specifically stated that they hoped I would be muzzled. This attitude is typical of a certain type of mentality, which cannot accept that reasonable, intelligent, men and women can, in good faith, come to opposed conclusions on a given issue. No, opinions they disagree with they view as not only wrong, but also evil.

It is very sad that this attitude should exist in a university, an institution historically associated with freedom of speech and thought and the unimpeded search for the truth.

'Stupid remark' spoils article

Your article on Bob Dylan (January 18) would have made for a fair judgement and interesting reading if it wasn't for your rather stupid remark...there were women with peroxide hair, and persian lamb coats, who probably waved good-bye to menopause years ago" versus "...a smattering of grandfatherly, grey-haired gentlemen wearing ties".

Student rejects seat

By ART MOSES

Simcoe Hall wants only one student to sit on a committee establishing the new Household Science program.

But the student handpicked for the honor refuses to accept the job.

In a strongly-worded letter, food sciences student council president Irene Miller says she was "quite surprised and disappointed that I would be the only student representative on a committee which portends in its term of reference to be structuring new educational programs for undergraduate students."

Miller calls for a new committee which would give students equal representation with the 12 faculty and administration appointees.

Thursday February 14

6:00 pm R.D. Laing the prominent psychologist and writer on madness and the family. (1 hour 50 min).

Her position was endorsed Wednesday by the food sciences student council and by the executive of the Students' Administrative Council.

The Household Science program was ordered established by Governing Council in December when it abolished the Faculty of Food Sciences. The move was opposed by food science students and faculty. Miller received her invitation to the committee last week from vice-provost Peter Meinke.

In her response Miller describes her "futile" experience last year on the Cruise committee which reviewed the future of food science at the university.

"Each meeting displayed wide dissent, the source of which, of course, was parochial sentiment offered by various administrative members."

Miller predicted the new committee "will be an exercise in frustration."

It will be unable to co-ordinate programs in household science, drawing on resources in various areas, "as long as the existing system encourrages competition for funds and students, and no real incentive is offered to develop coordination and communication channels between areas of common interest," she said.

Miller outlined the single possible solution.

"As the issues to which the (committee) will address itself are those of undergraduate students, then let those who will be most affected be most represented."

"My decision, therefore, is not to accept your invitation as long as the student representation on this committee will be one of tokenism..."

As proposed by Meinke, the committee includes two food science professors, one alumni, one student; representatives from the departments of urban and regional planning, biochemistry, and sociology; the faculties of engineering, arts and sciences and management studies; the school of social work; and the institute of child study.

Meinke was unavailable for comment. His secretary said he had only just read Miller's letter.

Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean,
Tears from the depth of some divine despair
Rise in the heart, and gather to the eyes,
In looking on the happy summer scenes,
And thinking of the days that are no more.

Dear as remembered kisses after May,
And sweet as those by hopeless fancy feigned
On lips that are for others; deep as love,
Deep as first love, and wild with all regret;
O Death in Life, the days that are no more!

Genocide in the Forest

Monday and Wednesday we looked at the new power projects taking shape in Latin America designed to supply the Brazilian economy with cheap sources of energy. Today, in an article adapted from Akwesasne Notes, we present an account of the native peoples affected by such development.

On June 4, 1973, the University of Bern released an open letter to the Paraguayan government. It charged that carefully-organized massacres of Ache Indians (otherwise known as Guayaki, of Tupi linguistic stock), added to the detention of Ache Indians in "reservations" indistinguishable from Nazi concentration camps and calculated to insure physical and psychological collapse, had taken place on genocidal proportions and had been carried on with the apparent approval and indeed connivance of Paraguayan governmental agencies.

Aches are being systematically hunted by armed raiding parties. Men, women, and children are being indiscriminately mowed down in such "hunts". The preferred weapon of the massacre is the machete, which saves the expense of bullets.

An exception may be made for Aches who submit to being tamed and trained as killers of their own people. Their reward is a diet capable of insuring survival and the assignment of captured Ache women as their "wives".

Both the Ache killers and their "wives" may be guaranteed survival during good behaviour. Those willing to accept unadulterated slavery may also be kept alive for indefinite periods as work hands at a bare subsistence level and without medical attention. The use of their language is discouraged; their traditional music prohibited. The attendant death rate from diseases of malnutrition and sheer lack of will to survive is decimating them.

The open letter of the University of Bern demands the immediate cessation of these crimes and the criminal prosecution of all those responsible, regardless of their station in life.

The Genocide Convention, which has been signed by Paraguay, and which must be viewed as a part of the customary Laws of Nations, explicitly encompasses all of the activities described in the Bern indictment.

In addition to genocide, the convention renders "complicity in genocide" subject to punishment as an international crime and declares that persons committing genocide or accomplices therein "shall be punished whether they are constitutionally responsible rulers, public officials, or private individuals."

Documentation of liquidation

The accusations contained in the open letter by the University of Bern are based upon extensive first-hand observation.

The pioneering study in this field has been presented by a German anthropologist, Dr. Mark Munzel. Titled "The Ache Indians: Genocide in Paraguay," and published in 1973 by the International Work Group for Indigenous Affairs in Copenhagen, it cites first-hand account upon first-hand account, identifying eyewitnesses located throughout the Americas and Western Europe. Dr. Munzel himself has been an eyewitness to some of these episodes.

Photographs included in his report show the bloated bodies of the dying on reservations. His attempts at persuading the killers, whom he met as they set out on an Indian hunt, to abandon their pursuits, have been fruitless. His denunciation of the practices led to a strongly-worded suggestion by the German diplomatic mission that he return to his German home base at the University of Frankfurt.

Colonel Patrick Montgomery, the British Secretary of the Anti-Slavery Society, presented substantially identical allegations before the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in Geneva on March 29, 1973, based upon independent and further first hand evidence. His report was not contradicted.

The Roman Catholic Church in Paraguay has acknowledged the existence of these practices and has denounced them. So has the World Council of Churches. The British and German presses have at various times featured accounts of the liquidation of these hapless people.

Surrender, or be exterminated

The Ache live in the southeastern corner of Paraguay between the Rios Paraguay and the Alto Parana. They never surrendered to the white man, and have always attempted to defend their territory against incursions, withdrawing deeper into the forest when they could not resist.

Although they have been the subject of extensive manhunts since colonial days, the situation for the Aches became worse in 1968 when a road was completed across their territory. More land is reserved for cattle and game has been frightened away. The Ache are forced into stealing cattle and implements to compensate for the reduced area of land, and reprisals from settlers follow.

A report of one raid said: "This raid was organized toward the end of August, 1971...some specialists in killing Aches were contracted for the purpose and were paid with money from the funds of the estancia...It was carried out with machete knives. There were between 12 and 20 killed, some of them most probably the mothers of kidnapped children. At least five small children were captured alive." One, a girl six years old was sold. A boy of four was sold or given away but died a few weeks after his capture. A boy of eight was kept by his kidnapper but died of smallpox in November, 1971.

Sometimes killing is indirect and European disease does the job:

In March and April, about 171 "wild" Aches were captured "and deported to the Ache reservation, whose population thus rose to about 277. Only 202 were left at the end of July. The dead seem to be long mostly to the new arrivals. The liquidation is due to the lack of food and medical attention. The Paraguayan Episcopal Conference explains the high death figure by the fact that the new captives were brought to the Reservation when an influenza epidemic was already raging there (which is, indirectly) mass murder."

The whole situation is an ideological battle over lifestyle, and is not perceived as being essentially racial in nature. Paraguay has always prided itself on having achieved harmonious relations between Europeans and indigenous people. It is the only republic in America where a pre-Colombian language, Guaraní, has survived and thrived, and where there is no racial stigma attached to people of non-European or mixed blood. Provided that is, that they live in a manner which does not interfere with a fascist government.

According to Miguel Chase-Sardi, one of the most prominent Paraguayan experts on native peoples, in a survey of the Paraguayan indigenes published in 1972, there were only 411 Guayakis, or Ache left.

Twilight of a people

The extermination of the Ache population of Paraguay has been progressing over a period of more than a decade to the point where the Aches are almost extinct. The Anti-Slavery Society of Great Britain voiced the apprehension "that plans may already exist for the liquidation of other tribes before the limelight has a chance to prevent it."

Liquidation of the Aches has progressed apace with road building and "settlement" of "civilized" communities upon once virgin soil, in short, with commercial penetration which has been heavily financed from the United States.

The involvement of the Paraguayan government has been direct and immediate. Its knowledge of these practices is incontrovertible. General Stroessner, the dictator of Paraguay, has himself been repeatedly informed, most recently by the International Commission of Jurists, which sought to "intervene" with him against these amassacres.

Evidence concerning the explicit Paraguayan governmental collaboration in the extermination of the Ache Indians has been furnished by eye-witnesses. The typical hunt leading to the roundup and massacre of the native population was consistently observed to be accompanied either by the military vehicles of the Paraguayan armed forces or by trucks "put at the disposal of the Reservation by the Ministry of Public Works and Communication with a soldier as the driver."

American involvement

It would seem fair to infer that the Paraguayan military vehicles accompanying Ache hunts are products of the United States. Widespread military facilities, airstrips and roads leading to them, pushed through inhabited as well as virgin territory once populated by Aches, have been made available to the United States.

Any assertion of the Nixon Administration that it lacks all knowledge and control of racial and political persecution—and specifically the genocide of the Ache people of Paraguay—would seem as credible under these circumstances as its recent protestations of innocence in Athens or Saigon.

The release of the University of Bern letter was noted by Swiss radio and television—it was greeted by total silence from the American press, radio, and television.

The London bureau of the New York Times was explicitly informed and was obviously sympathetic to giving the story the prominence it deserved. Yet no such story appeared.

LIP workers want support

By BARBARA SHENSTONE

Margaret Birch, minister responsible for youth, came under heavy attack at a meeting of workers from Local Initiatives Programs held Tuesday in the old Education Building.

LIP workers are calling for "significant and sustained" financial support from the provincial government for community social services initiated in Ontario by LIP since 1971.

"The province appears to believe and perhaps hopes that if it remains unco-operative long enough, the services will die and the needs will disappear," said Carolyn Egan, chairman of the Metro Work Group on Financing Emerging Social Services representing more than 80 LIP groups in Toronto.

Social services for senior citizens, immigrants, ex-convicts, mental patients, and alcoholics, as well as day-care and public information centres all need money, according Marvyn Novick of the Metro Work Group.

The Liberal and New Democratic Parties sent their social welfare critics to the meeting.

Margaret Campbell, Liberal MPP

for St. George, suggested the Conservatives refuse to take over financial support of LIP from the federal government because "they like to appear to be doing something for the people with somebody else's money."

Elie Martel, NDP member for Sudbury East called the provincial government "deceitful, dishonest, and irresponsible" and "obsessed with buildings and roads and not with people."

He pointed out only about three or four per cent of the provincial budget is reserved for welfare services for the entire province.

A policy statement, part of the work group mandate to be transmitted to the provincial government, urged "that Ontario publicly commit itself in policy and practise to a major financial role in the preservation of emerging community services which are effectively meeting legitimate social needs."

"That Ontario in a manner similar to Alberta and British Columbia, fully use federal cost-shared funding available for social services through the Canada Assistance Plan."

Candidate wants strong tie

An election for president of Scarborough College Student Council (SCSC) Wednesday and Thursday has brought forward a candidate who sees the central issue of the campaign as balkanization versus ties with the central campus.

John O'Donohue, one of four candidates in the running, wants to see strong ties between Scarborough and the central campus SAC maintained to prevent a balkanization occurring in the suburban campus.

Devoid of such weighty issues as discipline and tenure, the SCSC campaign seems to be dwelling on the issue of student services.

O'Donohue's platform is heavy with improving student services.

High on his list of things to accomplish is the creation of a horseback riding stable at the college for use of students, faculty and administrators. at Scarborough as well as itinerant central campus folk.

Banking services are also an area he says he would like to see pushed. He says there are no banks near the college and SCSC should start investigating whether a branch bank could be lured on campus.

O'Donohue also wants to see the start of a public forum, what he describes as a lecture series drawing top names in various fields to Scarborough to speak on major issues of the day.

Social life is also high on his list of things to get into.

He wants to start a regular monthly dance for students, improve the student pub, and start up regular wine and cheese parties for part-time students, students he says are frequently ignored.

He also wants to see SCSC continue its support of the Scarborough cultural magazine, Scarborough Flair, and continue support of the newly-formed drama club.

Some job description, eh? Forty bucks walking around money. Spending your working hours listening to the wretched pour out their misery.

Our customers cut through every stratum of society. Our territory is all over: prisons, tough bars, squalid rooms jammed with families of five, broadloomed suburban living rooms jammed with everything but hope. All those folk standing in their own garbage

Those are our people. We try to help them take the garbage and re-cycle it into something useful, rewarding and Christian.

We're helped by a decent education. By intelligence, empathy and a sense of humour. By developing a tough and gentle spirit. By having as a well-spring a rock-like faith in Christ.

Come help us help others to help themselves. It's an extraordinary life for the right kind of man.

Wilfred Owen

Rupert Brooke

War, and the pity of war

Wilfred Owen: War Poems and Others edited with an introduction and notes by Dominic Hibberd
Chatto and Windus, $6.50

This book is not about heroes. English poetry is not yet fit to speak of them.

Nor is it about deeds or lands, nor anything about glory, honour, might, majesty, dominion, or power, except War.

My subject is war, and the pity of War. The Poetry is in the pity.

Famous words from what is surely the most famous preface to a collection of poems ever written.

But what a pitiful and unpoetic life Wilfred Owen led.

Dominated by his mother; ashamed of his father and ashamed of that; his childhood wore itself away against the background of his parents' struggle to "maintain a middle-class style of life" (as Dominic Hibberd puts it in his introduction to this edition of Owen's poems).

The misery of the bourgeois urban poor, anywhere, anytime, haunted as they are by the necessity to keep up appearances, is increased by the inevitable isolation and noli-me-tangere pride of the individual family. A token week at the sea is more important than an insurance policy. But no one must know.

Owen's father had a responsible office job for a railway company but it paid very poorly. But this only increased the family's sense of frustration.

"All happy families are alike but an unhappy family is unhappy after its own fashion." Tolstoy was never poor. Only an affluent family can afford its own particular unhappiness.

The history of Owen's family is strikingly similar to that of D. H. Lawrence.

"A woman of character and refinement goes into a lower class, and has no satisfaction in her own life. She has had a passion for her husband, so the children are born of passion, and have heaps of vitality. But as her sons grow up she selects them as lovers—first the eldest, then the second. These sons are urged into life by their reciprocal love of their mother—urged on and on. But when they come to manhood they can't love, because their mother is the strongest power in their lives, and holds them." Sons and Lovers is fiction and autobiography and social history.

"It is a great tragedy..." Lawrence wrote Friday, February 8, 1874 about the situation of his book in one of his letters. "It's the tragedy of thousands of young men in England..."

Lawrence though was his mother's last male child. And he was much younger than any of his two brothers. (They were born in 1876 and 1878; Lawrence was born in 1885.)

Owen was the oldest child in his family. And he had a brother, Harold, only a few years younger than he was. (Wilfred was born in 1893, Harold in 1897.) The two were never very close. Owen was the one who was "clever"; Harold was simply "good with his hands".

Harold, as it happened, was the one who survived. Still alive today he only just a few years ago published a massive three volume history Journey from Obscurity of Wilfred and the Owen family.

The document is an incredibly deliberate, totally guileless document; at times awkwardly written; at times strangely moving.

"My mother was quite undivided in her opinion that from the point of view of a prospective student, I compared very unfavourably with Wilfred, whose apparent studious and somewhat diffident nature seemed to claim a right to be thought of as naturally scholarly."

Wilfred was established as a very favourite student at a local school "so much so that it was openly discussed in front of me whether or not, if I was sent to the school, I should jeopardize his chances in any way."

"My mother never did conceal herself with anything except my physical condition; any emotional distress or upset was always classed as misbehaviour."

Wilfred accepted his mother's view of himself and of his brother.

The result was isolation, extreme self-consciousness, a tendency towards self-dramatization, a tendency to view life through literature, and, not at least, a firm sense of destiny that expressed itself through an immature attachment to a romantic conception of the poet.

Harold Owen describes Wilfred as "driven by a panic-stricken necessity to prepare himself, so that he would be able to release a power which he so urgently sensed."

"Lend hand, O Fate," he himself cries, in one of his early poems, Lend hand, O Fate, for I am down, alas!
Fainting by violence of the Dance...

Ah, thanks I stand—the floor is crossed,
And I am where but few advance.

("O World of Many Worlds")

In a letter to his mother, "to some," he writes, "I seem a fellow without a footing in life. But I have my foothold, bold as any, kept for years. A boy, I guessed that the fullest, largest liveable life was that of a Poet. I know it now;... There is one title I prize, one clear call audible, one Sphere where I may influence the Truth, one Workshop whence I may send forth Beauty, one mode of living entirely congenial to me..."

Glorious will shine the opening of my heart;

The land shall freshen that was under gloom;

What matter if all men cry aloud and start,

And women hide bleak faces in their shawl,

At those hilarious thunders of my fall?

("Storm")

But Wilfred Owen's plans to become a Great Poet suffered a major set-back when he failed to win a London University scholarship—the only way he could have attended the institution.

He went away as an assistant to a vicar in return for room and board and tuition. He could not bear it. His continuous contact with the church exposed his religious doubts. He resolved to escape.

"This flight of mine," he writes (to his mother) "this flight from overwhelming elders, if it comes off, will only be my version of running away from college (Shelley, Coleridge)."

And then came the Great War. Now, God be thanked Who has matched us with His hour,

And caught our youth, and wakened us from sleeping,

With hand made sure, clear eye, and sharpened power,

To turn, as swimmers into cleanness leaping,

Glad from a world grown old and cold and weary,

Leave the sick hearts that honour could not move,

And half-men, and their dirty songs and dreary,

And all the little emptiness of love!

("1914: Peace")

The lines are not Owen's but Rupert Brooke's. They were written at the beginning of the war not as Owen's great poems were, out of that famous pity and the knowledge that, as Owen says in his preface, "all a poet can do today is warn. That is why the true Poets must be truthful."

Yet how accurately the lines describe the significance of the war to Owen as a poet. "As a swimmer into cleanness leaping." Away from his mother, away from his claustrophobic family, away from his own intense self-awareness.

And how accurately the lines describe our reaction to Owen.

Not to Brooke though. Even if he did write them.

Most of the contemporary popular reaction to Brooke was influenced by a feeling of guilt: he shouldn't have died so soon. Most of the prevailing critical reaction to Brooke since then has been influenced by a sense of betrayal: he escaped by dying so soon.

His famous sonnet sequence proclaimed loudly and triumphantly what the war—the Great War, the War to End All Wars—was going to be like. And it wasn't like that at all.

The poetry is not bad—it's just that in a social and historical context the war poems seem false and these five poems have come to represent all of his poems.

Brooke's John the Baptist, then, to Owen's Christ.

"I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear. He shall baptize you with the holy Ghost, and with fire:

"Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire."

There was what we can only describe as a cult about Rupert Brooke in the pre-War years. Frances Cornford wrote a famous—indeed notorious—poem:

A young Apollo, golden-haired Stands dreaming on the verge of strife
Magnificently unprepared
For the long littleness of life.

And this in 1905!

A graduate of Rugby and Cambridge. A Fabian socialist. A lesser member of Bloomsbury. An athlete. And a poet who looked it.

In 1967 Michael Hastings wrote a book about him called The Handsomest Man in England.

Wince.

But he was only quoting Yeats.

Among poets perhaps only Walt Whitman was more photographed than Brooke.

Ellery Sedgwick, editor of the Atlantic Monthly, described him thus:

"A face pagan, Praxitelean, shaped before the 'pale Gailean' had made the world grow gray at his breath.... A young man more beautiful than he I had never seen. Tall beyond the common, his loose weeds accentuated his height and the athletic grace of his work. His complexion was as ruddy as a young David's... I went home under the spell of it all and at the foot of the stairs cried aloud to my wife 'I have seen Shelley plain!'

It's almost embarrassing. This is how Siegfried Sassoon describes his appearance the one time they met: "He was wearing an open-necked blue shirt and old grey flannel trousers, with sandals on bare feet, and hadn't bothered to brush his brown-gold hair, which was, I thought, just a shade longer than it need have been. Seen in the full light as he sat beside the window, his eyes were a living blue and his face was still sunburnt from outdoor life on a Pacific island."

He had just come back from Tahiti. He brought back with him the memory of a love affair with Taatama, a Tahitian girl, the Mamua of "Tiare Tahiti," Taatama who had called him "Pupure," "Fair."

English exotic. He was "one in whom a procession of people were always more interested in than he was in them."

"Here," says Siegfried Sassoon, "I might well have thought—had my divinations been expressible—was a being singled out for some transcendent performance, some enshrined achievement. That, I believe, was the effect he made on many of those who met him as I did, and on all who fully understood the strength and sweetness of his character."

He was the embodiment of all that the pre-War years considered most perfect and all that the long years of that war would destroy.

To what degree he manipulated the worshippers at his shrine is an interesting question. One biographer records this perhaps illuminating note: at the age of 18 he went from Cambridge up to London to see his favourite play, Peter Pan.

The Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, Dean Inge a very eminent "pulpit professional" (as Owen refers to them) read one of Brooke's war sonnets in the course of a sermon. The Times picked up the sermon.

Overnight Brooke was famous. Within the month he was dead.

He becomes a symbol: "The thoughts to which he gave expression in the very few incomparable war sonnets which he has left behind will be shared by many thousands of young men moving resolutely and blithely forward into this, the hardest, the cruellest, and the least-rewarded of all the wars that men have fought. They are a whole history and revelation of Rupert Brooke himself. Joyous, fearless, versatile, deeply instructed, with classic symmetry of mind and body, he was all that one would wish in England's noblest sons to be in days when no sacrifice but the most precious is acceptable, and the most precious is that which is most freely proffered."

So wrote Winston Churchill in the obituary published in the Times.

*The day that Youth died,
There came to his grave-side,
In decent mourning, from the county's ends,
Those scatter'd friends Who had lived the boon companions of his* *prime,

And laughed with him and sung with him and wasted,
In feast and wine and many-crown's car-rouse,
The days and nights and dawns of the time
When Youth kept open house....
Came Grief, so noisy a widow, that all said,
'Had he but wed
Her elder sister Sorrow, in his stead!'
And by her, trying to soothe her all the time,
The fatherless children, Colour, Tune, and Rhyme.
(The sweet lad Rhyme, ran allcomprehending...*

*There stood Romance,
The furrowing tears had mark'd her rouged cheek;
Beauty was there,
Pale in her black; dry-eyed; she stood alone.
Poor maz'd Imagination; Fancy wild;
Ardour, the sunlight on his greying hair;
Contentment, who had known Youth as a child
And never seen him since. And Spring came too,
Dancing over the tombs, and brought him flowers
She did not stay for long.
And Truth, and Grace, and all the merry crew, The laughing Winds and Rivers, and lithe Hours;
And Hope, the dewy-eyed; and sorrowing Song;
Yes, with much woe and mourning general,
At dead Youth's funeral....*

(Rupert Brooke "The Funeral of Youth: Trenchy")

Brooke's death though in line with his life was only symbolic.

This glamorous soldier poet died of blood poisoning or of sunstroke or from a bite on the lip from a gnat in Port Said—the accounts differ—and before he had ever been under fire.

He died on board a French hospital ship —"he was practically the only patient on the ship and the chief surgeon gave up his whole time to the case, and I believe hardly left him at all"—in the middle of the Mediterranean.

He was buried on the Greek Isle of Skyros, thereafter referred to in various memoirs and reminiscences as "Rupert's island."

And Owen? This is how Sassoon describes "my little friend": "he was short, dark-haired, shyly hesitant... He listened eagerly, questioning with reticent intelligence. He had seemed an interesting little chap but had not struck me as remarkable. In fact my first view of him was as a rather ordinary young man, perceptibly provincial, though unobtrusively ardent in his responses to my lordly dictums about poetry... It amuses me to remember that... I wondered whether his poems were any good!"

This was Sassoon's first impression, forgivable as such. (Owen's first impression of Sassoon perhaps was a bit more favourable: "He is very tall and stately with a fine firm chisel'd (whow's that?) head, ordinary short brown hair. The general expression of his face is one of boredom.")

*The poppy and the pansy blow . . .
("Granchester")*

On October 10, 1918 Owen wrote to Sassoon: "I have found brave companionship in a poppy behind whose stalk I took cover from five machine-guns and several howitzers."

Less than a month later, one week before Armistice Day, Owen was killed while leading an attack.

*Land, hand, O Fate, for I am done, am lost!
Fainting by violence of the Dance...
Ah, thanks, I stand—the floor is crossed
And I am where but few advance.*

His family, as Harold Owen records, "received the dreaded telegram at 12 noon on 11 November, Armistice Day. The church bells were still ringing, the bands playing and the jubilant bands surging together."

There are a couple of boxes of illustrated London News magazines from the war years in the attic of my parents' house together with, somewhere in the attic, a bugle without a mouthpiece and a World War I helmet—brought back by the great-uncle who died from gangrene after the war or sent back to the mother and sister of the great-uncle who never came back.

Among the "Sketches from our Correspondents" and the pictures of George V's daughters in nurses' uniform, among the Honour Rolls of the Dead (officers only), among the advertisements for Oxo and Ovaltine and Players' cigarettes (and wheelchairs and convalescents' beds and artificial legs) is a notice of Brooke's death.

"A genuine poet has been taken from England in the untimely death from sunstroke at the front, at Lemnos, near the Dardanelles, of Rupert Brooke, cut off in the prime of his high powers. Poetry was born in Rupert Brooke, at Rugby as a boy, and at Cambridge, he wrote constantly, always with an appealing charm, but at the same time, with an ever present note of pathos . . ."

It goes on.
No notice ever appeared of Owen's death.

In 1917, Owen had been invalided home suffering from shell-shock. He spent four months at Craiglockart War Hospital near Edinburgh. (This is where he met Sassoon.) "It was a busy time," writes Hibberd, "and by day Owen was soon happy and confident again; but at night he was, like most of the patients, the victim of violent nightmares. These 'war dreams' persisted for most of his stay and affected him on occasions for the rest of his life. Remembering war experience exposed Owen to the risk of further nightmares; writing about war thus took some courage...."

When I am asleep, dreaming and lulled and warm

They come, the homeless ones, the noiseless dead.

(Sassoon: "Death's Brotherhood.")
A number of the war poems deal with these nightmares: Owen's "Conscious", "Dulce et Decorum Est", "Strange Meeting", "Kind Ghosts",

The tendency is poignantly inverted in Sassoon's "Everyone Sang"
*Everyone suddenly burst out singing
And I was filled with such delight
As prisoned birds must find in Freedom, Winging wildly across the white orchards and dark-green fields; on on and out of sight.*

*Everyone's voice was suddenly lifted;
And beauty came like the setting sun;
My heart was shaken with tears; and horror*

Drifted away... O, but Everyone was a bird; and the song was wordless; the singing will never be done. The war ended and everyone burst out singing. Only then did Owen's poems appear to remind everyone of what it had been like.

And then it was the future itself that began to seem impossible.

The world moved from a terror of what it had been to a terror of what would be in the course of "the long, forlorn, relentless trend, / From larger day to huger night," ("Insensibility").

Harold visited his brother while he was at an officer's training camp. Wilfred was very much afraid that he would fail the "passing out" exam.

Harold remonstrated with him.
The bitterness of Wilfred's reply surprised him, he says.

"What does Keats have to teach me of rifle and machine-gun drill?" Wilfred cried: "...How will Shelley show me how to hate or any poet teach me the trajectory of a bullet?"

Exactly.
Once Owen had gone to war he clung to his poetry with a vengeance.

*I dreamed kind Jesus fouled the big-gun gears;
And caused a permanent stoppage in all bolts;
And buckled with a smile Mausers and Colts;
And rusted every bayonet with his tears.*

"A Soldier's Dream"
Jesus didn't.
*And we are here as on a darkling plain Swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight,
Where ignorant armies clash by night.*

"All that a poet can do today is warn. That is why the true Poets must be truthful."
Owen was.

This is the fourth edition of Owen's poems. Siegfried Sassoon and Edith Sitwell's edition, the first, published those poems by which Owen has been and will always be best known. Edmund Blunden's edition contained a selection from the juvenalia as well as an important memoir. Cecil Day Lewis' edition recorded variant readings and included more juvenalia.

Cecil Day Lewis' edition is still available as a New Directions paperback for much less than this hardcover edition ($2.00, per -haps, to $6.50).

Hibberd, though, and he is the first to do this, has arranged the poems in chronological order and has included where appropriate letters and passages from the letters.

Owen was not a great letter writer—here at least he fails to imitate his revered Keats—but he was sincere, even sincerely literary. The representative letters included are moving.

This is the edition to read in tandem with the hoped for, soon to be completed definitive biography of Owen by Jon Stallworthy.

Hibberd does not reprint the Blunden memoir as did Day Lewis. He deals with Owen's life in his own introduction. But he does include even more juvenalia and he records the pious hope—since as much as half of Owen's surviving verse remains unpublished—that a "fifth edition, both definitive and comprehensive, will eventually be available to the specialist."

A note of the inside front flap of the book jacket of this edition says that "although the volume is intended for the general reader the needs of students have been borne in mind."

As they have.
A chronological table setting out in parallel columns events in Owen's life and contemporary events is included. (1901/ Owen's life: WO starts at Birkenhead Institute; Contemporary Events: Labour Party founded; Queen Victoria dies.)

The bibliography after discussing books on Owen and "books having sections on him," suggests, among others, A Farewell to Arms and All Quiet on the Western Front.

As with the juvenalia the editor is being inclusive at a price.

Nevertheless this is a good edition of the work of a truly significant poet.

randy robertson

This statue of Rupert Brooke, erected on the Greek island of Skiros where he was buried after his death in 1915, bears the inscription: "To Rupert Brooke, the young English poet, who was a noble friend of Greece and of immortal poetry."

But Sassoon writes later with more distance, "Under ordinary conditions his wasn't a spiritual face. It was one of the mould which either coarsens or refines itself in later life. I cannot say that I ever saw what is called 'a look of genius' in it. His mouth was resolute and humorous, his eyes long and heavy-lidded, quiescent rather than penetrating. They were somewhat sleepy eyes, kind, shrewd, and seldom lit up from within. They seemed, like much else in his personality, to be instinctively guarding the secret sources of his inward power and integrity."

He says Owen referred to Sassoon as Don Quixote and to himself as Sancho Panza.

Of his own period of active service Sassoon says, "he seldom spoke; I was careful to avoid questioning him about the experiences which had caused his nervous breakdown and was only vaguely aware of what he had been through in the St. Quentin sector and elsewhere. Fourteen years later, when reading the letters quoted by Edmund Blunden in his finally authoritative Memoir, I discovered that Wilfred had endured worse things than I had realised from the little he told me. On arriving at the Western Front he had immediately encountered abominable conditions of winter weather and attrition warfare....

"His thick dark hair was already touched with white above the ears."

He was only 24.

He was fighting a war he could no longer support. Yet he returned to France, he returned to No Man's Land.

Gas! Gas! Quick, boys! An ecstasy of lumbbling,

*Fitting the clumsy helmets just in time;
But some one still was yelling out and stumbling*

*And floundering like a man in fire or lime....
Dim, through the misty panes and thick
green lights,*

*As under a green sea, I saw him drowning.
In all my dreams, before my helpless sight,
He plunges at me, guttering, choking, drowning.*

("Dulce Et Decorum Est")

Wilfred Owen went back to that.
"But they are troops who fade, not flowers,
For poets' fearful fooling."

("Insensibility")

Rupert Brooke wrote some very lilting, very famous lines about flowers:

*Just now the lilac is in bloom,
All before my little room;
And in my flower-beds, I think,
Smile the carnation and the pink;*

And down the borders, well I know,

*But they are troops who fade, not flowers,
For poets' fearful fooling.*

But they are troops who fade, not flowers,
For poets' fearful fooling.

Pseudo-Spanish "Quixote" is "Nurse Nancy's Passion" of the ballet world

Ed Sullivan...

Minkus: Don Quixote
John Lanchberry: Elizabeth
Trust Orchestra
Angel S-37008

Ed Sullivan was often called the greatest non-talent in the entertainment world. Even though he hosted a network variety show for some 17 years, it was widely known that the Stone Face had not a single marketable talent. A similar case has come with Angel's new recording of Minkus's ballet 'Don Quixote', actually a soundtrack from the filmed version of the ballet made last year. Now, guess who stars in the film? None other than that colossus in tights, Rudolf Nureyev, now in town with the National Ballet. Why bring up the whole Ed Sullivan angle then? C'mon, guess.

Right on the cover of this record stands the man himself in a full colour shot, surrounded by a trio of Spanish lovelies. El Rudolfo strums a guitar, and wears a frilly, multi-coloured peasant shirt. Verrrry spiffy. All is clear, now (I hope). Beautiful as the fella is, he doesn't contribute a jot to the music. He can dance, he can choreograph, he can be charming and witty (so I'm told) but let's face it gang, he can't play worth a damn.

And, boy! did this record need something to rescue it—not even Nureyev can help. A word of explanation will show why: Ludwig Minkus (familiar, eh?) was a composer born in Vienna in 1825, but lived in Russia from the age of 25 on. In that land he wrote over 20 ballets, described (rather charitably, I thought) in the liner notes as "uncomplicated...easily remembered and simple in its form and rhythmic pattern". Add understatement to your list of characteristics of liner-note writers.

Frankly, to anyone whose tastes in classical music have progressed beyond Suppe (Light Cavalry Overture) or Johann Strauss, Minkus is a dull, blathering bore. Having to listen to this bubbly, pseudo-spanish music without the entertainment provided by the likes of Nureyev is as grating as being forced to read a Harlequin paperback (titles like "Nurse Nancy's Passion" or "Whispering Willows"). Gak.

Okay, the music is played well, and Lanchberry had done an ace job of re-arranging the selections to make some sense, but it's a lost cause. Minkus is better off in the land of the forgotten; it's only when there's something to take your mind off the music that this sort of garbage becomes tolerable. Of course, every ballet company worth its salt has a piece like this in its bag of tricks. In Copenhagen it's a potboiler in three acts called "Napoli"—same sort of music, similar costumes and plot, just switch the scene to Italy. Our very own National Ballet has its "Nutcracker", which, while blessed with music that has at least something to offer, is still played to death every year. Can't blame them, though it's traditional in this country for ballet companies to perch precariously on the verge of total collapse, so a little bit of profit-making can't be condemned outright. Still, a little voice in the back of my mind tells me that out there somewhere there must be ballet music which appeals to the general public but still maintains the least bit of artistic integrity and interest.

So there, Angel Records!! Don't muck about with the mighty reviewer here! Let's have something demanding and probably unpopular like Schoenberg or Bartok! Harrumph!

Total Eclipse fades on all counts at Firehall

Firehall Theatre's current production of Total Eclipse, the play dealing with the love relationship of the French poets Rimbaud and Verlaine, has absolutely nothing to recommend itself. Not only does it fail as a piece of theatre, it completely distorts the actual historical relationship between the two men.

A play that is advertised as dealing with Rimbaud and Verlaine's "attempt to extend the limits of experience in one of the most notorious love affairs in history" naturally creates certain expectations in the spectator none of them are met in this production.

British playwright Christopher Hampton's script is superficial, undramatic and dull lacking any sense of the wit, style and poetry one associates with the artists he is portraying. The set design and acting of the Firehall Theatre ensemble representing a period of 21 years in Verlaine and Rimbaud's life is similarly hap-hazard, two-dimensional and devoid of atmosphere and style.

Director Anne Tait's casting of the title roles borders on the grotesque. Verlaine was 27 and still a strikingly handsome man when he first met the 16 year old Rimbaud. Ray Stancer as Verlaine is long past middle age and has neither the looks nor the personality and intellectual endowment to make credible his captivation of the young Rimbaud. John Astington as Rimbaud is similarly close to twice the age of the poet he is portraying and fails to capture the duality in character of young genius and profligate required of his role. His boorish Dustin Hoffman imitations as he attempts to outrage Verlaine's bourgeois family are too obvious and cute and create little sympathy for his character. Neither the author nor the director and actors succeed in creating the very emotional and sexual relationship that is the supposed core and central theme of the play.

But while Total Eclipse is merely theatrically ineffective, it is also historically misleading and downright insulting in its portrayal of Rimbaud and Verlaine's homosexual relationship. Playwright Hampton constantly portrays Rimbaud as the gay tempter who exploits and torments the straight Verlaine and causes the break-up of his marriage until he attempts to shoot Rimbaud in anguish. Ray Stancer's mawkish portrayal of Verlaine is simply irreconcilable with the poet's true feelings about gay love which he expresses in such poems as "Hommes", as translated by André Stein. "...Your ass straddling my thighs Penetrating them with their soft burden, While my heavy prick is frolicking about Only to make you rejoice..."

Director Tait never shows the two poets actually loving one another and one is left wondering what the two actually see in one another. Verlaine briefly touches Rimbaud's shoulder in scene five as if he were massaging a sore muscle. Otherwise the play is filled with enough hateful arguments, beating, kicking and stabbing of the palms to satisfy the most grotesque misconceptions of a complacent straight audience.

The two scenes out of 12 that do work theatrically, — Verlaine's attempted shooting of Rimbaud and Verlaine's final reminiscences in a Paris café at the conclusion of the play — have a similar anti-gay theme. The long dead Rimbaud appears to Verlaine in the last scene as in a dream and the two lovers are happily reunited as if their love could exist only in illusion, not in reality. Verlaine absurdly emerges as the savior of Rimbaud's risqué manuscripts which his pious relatives attempt to destroy. Hampton depicts Verlaine refusing to distort the memory and varied aspects of Rimbaud's character. The author himself, however, distorts historical fact and deals dishonestly and ineffectually with this "most notorious love affair in history". Total eclipse.

Plenty of flair, sparkle in Vic version of Boyfriend

The Boyfriend, Sandy Wilson's affectionate spoof on Hollywood musical comedy tradition, is being presented this week at Hart House by the Victoria College Music Club. The Boyfriend has been a popular show since its conception both on the amateur and professional circuit. It's even been made into a movie (starring faded model Twiggy). The show is fun — lots of danceable and singable tunes, and plenty of room for character actors.

The plot consists of five "perfect young ladies" from Madame Dubonnet's finishing school on the Riviera, singing and dancing their way into the arms of five perfect young men. There is of course a profusion of heart-breaks, tears, mistaken identities and reunions in the interim. Polly Browne, "poor little rich girl" deplores her father's money and therefore immediately falls in love with Tony, a poor messenger boy. In reality Tony is of course a member of the same social class, a Brockhurst. In the end the truth is known, Tony and Polly are married and go to live happily ever after in a "room in Bloomsbury".

The members of the cast deserving most mention are the comic leads, Cathy Findlay as Maisie and Joel Greenberg as Bobby. Not only do both have an incredible sense of comedy and flair, but they dance well. Also commendable are Tim Sheehan and Penelope Ward-Whate as Lord and Lady Brockhurst, the British lecher and his stuffy wife. Sheehan exudes an excellent feeling of age in the role while Ward-Whate handling herself with grace and charm, often steals the scene.

Polly and Tony played by Penelope Tibbles and David Falls are sweet enough and handle cliché well, but unfortunately are often difficult to hear. Dianne Huestis who plays Madame Dubonnet has a delightful voice and looks wonderful in the part of the "headmistress".

A combination of music, under the direction of Dave Passmore, lively choreography by Russell Kilde and excellent and colourful costuming helps to create a sparkling show, well worth attending.

Actor finally consummates

French language duo entertain at P'tit Bonheur

Toronto's French language theatre Le Théâtre du P'tit Bonheur's two newest one act plays, finish tomorrow. The first, Faut que tu fasses ta vie is not a play at all but a series of skits for four actors. Parts of it shine, such as the opening monologue where the actress manages to say the name Gérard any number of ways with as many different intonations as possible.

Sandra Phillips and Anne-Marie Sparkes provided most of the liveliness of the piece, but their performances, as well as those by Roland Dupuis and Georges Marion were marred by a tendency to throw away lines. John Van Burek the director moves his actors well, but perhaps needs to spend more time coaching them, instead of working for beautiful tableau effects.

The second play, Joualez-moi d'amour by Québec playwright Jean Barbeau, created quite a sensation when it was first produced in Montréal last summer, both for its theatrical excellence and for its political and social implications. Louise Nolan and Richard Niquette do Toronto proud in their version of the play.

Jules, played by Richard Niquette goes to a prostitute, Julie, because only with prostitutes can he play his incestuous mother son games. Alas, this time it does not work, he does not get excited. The problem is diagnosed to be Julie's parisian French, so Jules attempts to teach her joual. The sentence chosen is: J'sé pas c'qui martient d'te crisser n'claque. Poor Julie can never quite get her tongue around the words. Finally Jules gets angry and attempts to scare her, and finds himself aroused. The experiment is not repeatable until they discover that Jules was cursing her in solid Québécois. Now that Jules has found his way around impotence to identify everything is all right.

Both actors in Joualez-moi have a firm grasp on their roles. Richard Niquette is excellent, especially when dressed as a kid, in blue jean shorts and a yellow t-shirt with a motorcycle printed on it.

Nolan is almost too pretty to play the role of the prostitute but manages to do so in spite of her looks, as she unsuccessfully tries to put Niquette at ease so they can go to bed. As she puts it, he is the first good looking guy she has had in two weeks, and it is so nice to combine business with pleasure.

Jean-Marc Amyot, who is responsible for the direction has a good eye for the comic, so that we do not mind seeing some of the more obvious effects that the play calls for. Roger Guetta, again doing design, gives a set that is a mixture of real and representational, that is not wholly successful but certainly serviceable.

Romeo and Juliet: for once, a duplication is forgivable

Prokofiev: Romeo and Juliet
Lorin Maazel, Cleveland Orchestra
London CSA 2312

This recording comes hard on the heels of Andre Previn's rendition of the very same music issued last November. Originally, this one was billed as the "World Premier Stereo Recording", but the boys at the EMI beat Decca to it.

What makes a work some 39 years old eligible for "world premiere" status? Well, strange to say, the music has waited this long for proper attention to be devoted to it in its complete form. Prokofiev lived to see the ballet staged many times, but he also arranged two concert suites, drawn from the highlights of the score, for public use away from the stage. Over the years, these suites acquired an evergreen status in the repertoire, entirely eclipsing the complete work, which only appeared in the staged form. And now that two splendid recordings have brought the complete score to us, we can finally savor the riches of the music away from the confines of the ballet stage.

I covered the Andre Previn set in my Christmas roundup of records, but to recap: he and the London Symphony give a fine reading of the score, backed up by solid engineering. The accompanying libretto is a treat for the ballet fan, chock full of photos of famous ballet artists as the star-crossed lovers.

Now, with the London version on the turntable, it's hard to imagine why they waited so long to record the music. This is one duplication that seems forgivable, and not only because of the long absence this music has had from the recorded repertoire. Maazel takes a genuinely different approach to the music, leaning more towards faster tempi and herculean efforts from the percussion section. Some of the passages which sound slow and drawn-out (presumably for dramatic effect) in the Previn edition are taken at a blistering pace on Maazel's production.

This difference won't be for everybody, and I can see many favouring Previn over Maazel. What the latter has produced, though is an audio spectacular of a high order. London's engineering is carried to extremes here, with the bass instruments getting the lion's share of the balance. Dolby-quieted tapes also make it a superbly produced version. There is one advantage that this set has over Maazel's: the Cleveland Orchestra. Recently, this group lost George Szell, its conductor for many years, who had led the ensemble on dozens of recordings for Columbia. Those records were among the best ever produced on that label (in particular, the Haydn symphonies 93 & 94) but Szell's death effectively terminated the recording contract.

The orchestra has found a new home on London, and to judge from the press releases, that record company is nothing short of ecstatic to have them on board. In the long run, I'd probably pick this recording over Previn's, which sounds echoey and lacklustre in comparison to this splendid item. And, for once I'm not just talking about technical virtues; the Cleveland Orchestra is a one-of-a-kind group, and with Maazel's able leadership they appear on the ballet disc of the year. An absolutely gorgeous recording, a triumph for a great orchestra.

In these troubled times, I'm afraid to say that London's discs, like all others list for about seven clams apiece. True, they are imported, perfect-surface items with nary a trace of click or pop, but $21 is a lot of bread. With judicious shopping, you should be able to get your hands on it for under $15; try Round Records or keep your eyes open for a sale. But even at full list, it's a set worth having.

instructions, which determine a piece's characteristic "sound". The quartets of Beethoven and Mozart treated each of the instruments (2 violins, viola and 'cello) in an individual manner, something like four soloists getting together, with the first violin having the most to say. This style was reflected in the string writing for large orchestra, but not to such an extent. The impressionists changed this style radically, keeping each musician in the orchestra busy with complex writing designed to produce a full ethereal sound. Typically, a classical string section would be divided along four lines: 1st violin, 2nd violin, viola, 'cello (with the basses playing the same music as the 'cello). The impressionists divided the ranks of fiddlers up into smaller units: four first violins; another four firsts; small divisions of the violas, 'cellos and so on. And this all came down to be reflected in the quartets that Debussy and Ravel penned. Both quartets have their differences, but are so representative of this change in string writing that they have been permanently associated with one another.

This recording, unfortunately, does not live up to the spirit of the music. The Danish Quartet just doesn't have the ability to challenge the stars of the quartet world, such as the Juilliard Quartet, whose 1972 recording of the same music on Columbia won many awards. It's not so much that the music is badly played (they do get all the notes) but that the shimmer seems lost from the proceedings. The Debussy should sound almost as if it's breathing naturally; the Ravel is a little more complex, but in both cases, the Danish players don't seem to be going much farther than the printed instructions.

They are competent, straightforward players, and would probably shine in Mozart or Haydn. This disc, produced by Valois in France is one of a series released through Telefunken, and it may be that these players have recorded more for that company. If so, then they certainly deserve a second hearing. For now, pass up this one in favour of the Juilliard disc. The sound on the Telefunken item is (as usual) superb with not a trace of surface noise, a claim that Columbia's pressings sadly lack. The $7.98 list on the Telefunken is unfortunate, but such are the ways of music companies today. The domestically-pressed Columbia can still be picked up for under $5, if you look hard. But if you're a classical rookie, don't pass up this music; it belongs in even the smallest collection.

Impressionist quartets lack sparkle

Debussy: String Quartet
Ravel: String Quartet
Danish String Quartet
Telefunken SAT 22541

In virtually every recording of the Debussy Quartet, the Ravel number makes an appearance, and for good reason. These pieces are the Bobsey twins of the quartet repertoire, so alike in style that it's occasionally possible to forget who composed which.

As might be expected, these works have been recorded many times, by every quartet worth its resin, and the performances have been numberless. There is unquestionably something which continues to attract listeners to the music, especially those who would have no truck with string quartets under normal circumstances. Most of this appeal has to do with the shimmering, pastel-like sonorities that the composers wrote into the parts, particularly Debussy.

Most quartets differ from orchestral pieces in the orchestration — the notes given to each instrument along with the playing

And that's the truth!

Serpico: a movie tries to get at why cops can be bad-asses, but only skims the surface

Innumerable movies from the '30s and '40s told us that policemen were heroic, kindly servants of the people. Innumerable movies today tell us just the opposite, that cops on the beat are venal and vicious, that their bosses are pompous, cowardly hypocrites. The latter picture no doubt comes closer to the truth, at least in the USA. But what I'd like to see is a movie that tried to deal with the issues honestly: why do so many policemen take graft? why do they no longer draw the line at "dirty" (i.e. drug-related) graft? Do brutal men gravitate to police forces, or do their duties and associates brutalize them? Do they enforce, or reinforce, each others' worst characteristics?

Some of these questions are raised in Serpico. But they, and other questions specifically tied to this story, are raised in such a superficial, rhetorical way as to stay unanswered. The real Serpico was a New York patrolman who became a detective. He refused graft altogether, infuriating his colleagues on the take. His efforts to reform the police department from inside were futile; finally he broke silence by talking to the New York Times and testified before a grand jury. Shortly thereafter he was shot while on a case; the movie (and I presume the documentary book on which it was based) says that his partners deliberately let him be shot because they wanted him out. He recovered, retired from the force, and his revelations led to the Knapp Commission hearings that rocked the city and the department.

In this movie, Serpico undergoes a metamorphosis from a rather sombre but eager recruit into a wild-maned creature, like something from a Warhol movie, that skulks the streets of New York with a gold ring in his earlobe. His isolation, bucked up by his own bitterness, is the big unifying theme in the movie, though we don't even get enough information about that. Al Pacino, as Serpico, makes the movie what it is — but a smashing performance is no longer enough to make a movie. Pacino is a fireball of an actor, but we have lots of young fireball actors around now and it's exasperating to see them wasted in vehicles unworthy of their talents. (Robert deNiro, an exception, found his metier in Mean Streets.)

It's not that Serpico is trash — it's nowhere near trash — but director Sidney Lumet almost sinks the whole venture with his waterlogged sensibilities. Lumet's flair is for the theatrical. Heavily punctuated orations, ponderous emotions, effects guaranteed to reach all the way to the second balcony do not make good cinema. (To be fair, in some of his earlier work, like Long Day's Journey into Night, the material and its treatment were so good you didn't even think that you were watching filmed theatre). When Lumet remembers it's a movie he's making, he's like an amateur cook who throws everything on the spicereack into his stew. He culls effects from other directors and throws them into Serpico with little understanding of how they're going to look or what they're doing to the movie. The old impresario just wasn't up to Serpico, didn't know how to pace it or slant it, and even the brilliant film editor Dede Allen (whose triumph was Bonnie and Clyde) couldn't bring the story to life. It's a pity, for Serpico's material is to other cop stories like Bullitt or The French Connection what Coriolanus is to Ben-Hur.

When the preview of Serpico ended the audience broke into long, loud applause. I kept wondering why. It wasn't a bad two hours (there are many less worthy movies in town right now) but applause in movie theatres is as rare as it is in funeral parlors. Why Serpico? They could have been praising Pacino for his performance, or maybe they appreciated the courageously downbeat (but not depressing) ending. But I think they were applauding the film's good intentions. The attitudes in Serpico were impeccably humane and reformist, and it's terribly nice to stand up for justice by clapping for a movie.

Woody Allen's all strung out in Sleeper.

Woody Allen casts his baleful eye on science

The opening sequence in Woody Allen's new movie, Sleeper, harks back to the final, and most successful, of the skits in Everything You Wanted to Know About Sex.

In the earlier movie, Allen did a brilliant parody of the American space program — emission control — in answer to Dr. Reuben's question, "What Is Ejaculation". In Sleeper, Allen casts a baleful eye on the world of science once again.

The film opens with the revival of Allen two hundred years in the future, thanks to the wonders of cryogenics.

In his former life, Allen was Miles (Davis) Monroe, owner of a health food store in Greenwich Village, and jazz clarinetist. In fact, Allen does play clarinet, joining an authentic old-time New Orleans ragtime aggregation on the soundtrack.

The future, Allen is quick to discover, is like the present, only more so. The world is ruled by a cross between Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Billy Graham. Middle America has become the final arbiter of taste. The result is not so much 1984 as the Empire of the Bland.

Miles himself becomes Milo, all-purpose robot, by applying pancake make-up and shoving what looks like a shower nozzle in his mouth.

Milo soon disturbs his owner Diane Keaton's comfortable existence as a bad hip poetess, and the two of them set off on a mission which eventually results in the destruction of a too-restrictive social order.

Along the way, Allen indulges in some of his funniest sight-gags yet. By now, it must be almost impossible to think up an original sight-gag, but Allen has a genius for doing variations on the familiar.

The best example in Sleeper is the old slipping on a banana peel number. The banana, however, is as big as a canoe, through hydroponics.

Another standard comic gambit is the recurring gag, which escalates as the film goes on. In Sleeper, the gag is the ineptitude of two security police trying to fire their ammunition — each time we see this pair the results of their ineptitude are a little more drastic.

Something unexpected in Sleeper — but highly successful — was Allen's parody of Vivian Leigh as Blanche Dubois in Tennessee Williams' Streetcar Named Desire ("Oh, I'm just a spring of sassafras") though Diane Keaton's rendition of Brando's Kowalski is not quite in the same league.

Allen also goes afield for the President's nose sequence, a steal from Gogol's story The Nose.

A problem in Allen's movies is an imbalance of talent between himself and his straight woman, here Diane Keaton.

(Any relation to Buster?) The lead female role in an Allen movie tends to be played by his current wife. A logical choice from one angle is bad from another. Diane Keaton is no comedienne, nor was Allen's first wife, his nameless (because name forgotten) foil in Take the Money and Run.

Margaret Dumont in the Marx Brothers' films was perhaps the classic "straight woman", but there are supporting actresses in Sleeper who seem capable of filling the bill. Notably, there is Allen's supervisor at a reprogramming centre, where, in a parody of Clockwork Orange, Allen's dangerous tendencies are temporarily programmed out of him, and he is conditioned to the unredeemed banality all around.

The secret may be that Woody Allen can not work well unless he does just about everything, from writing to directing to being on the screen 99 per cent of the time. With all the risks that entails. Certainly in Everything You Wanted to Know, a major defect was too many cooks with fingers in the pie.

In Sleeper, inspiration flags now and again, and the plot is one digression. Still, for me anyway the end came too soon. This is a damn short movie. So I postponed the end by seeing it again.

Lou Reed's Berlin: love seen through the eyes of hate

Berlin
Lou Reed
RCA Victor; $6.29

Berlin is the ultimate trip into the deformed universe created by Lou Reed for the sado-masochists in the audience. Reed's latest LP is the climax of the work he began with the sorely missed Velvet Underground and it is guaranteed to whip up your blood pressure. Berlin is the account of a love affair, between two strung out speed freaks, that has as much tenderness as a razor slitting a jugular vein. As the venom spews forth, we can witness the total degeneration of two monsters as they whine their way through a comic tragedy that will become a classic of the seventies.

Reed, who gave us "Walk on the Wild Side"; has managed to develop a brilliant, well orchestrated theme infused with just the right amounts of hatred, perversion and masochism. The concept of Berlin revolves around the flat, emotionless narrative style of Reed's voice which shows no compassion for either character. In a way this LP is a parody of the rock-opera theme, but unlike The Who, Reed refuses to take the whole thing seriously and by his restraint makes the album a musical version of cinema-verité. In fact there are many similarities between Berlin and the movie Cabaret.

There is a brief moment of happiness as side one opens but it quickly fades into a very beautiful and romantic piano opening for "Lady Day", where we meet the two lovers as their affair begins. Reed guides us through "Men of Good Fortune", "Caroline Says I" and "How do you think it feels" without showing any compassion for Jim, as Caroline, his "Germanic Queen", taunts, tortures, humiliates and deceives him. She becomes colder as her addiction and depravity increase, but Jim's passivity collapses, as Reed builds up the tension, to the point where, in a jealous rage, he whips and beats Caroline senseless. Her only comment, typical of Reed's vision, is to say that the whole thing is a bum trip.

On side two we see the development of Jim's character, as his assault upon Caroline becomes more vindictive and vituperative. In "Caroline Says II" and "The Kids" he sees her as a wasted creature who is cold and without any feelings, a junkie and where who is unable to turn anyone or anything down. And when her children are taken away, by the welfare people, he enjoys her suffering and pain. The result of all this is that Caroline commits suicide by slashing her wrists, and in "The Bed" Jim relives their happier moments but, instead of sorrow, he feels funny that the whole thing ever happened.

The climax of Berlin is the aptly named "Sad Song" which allows Reed to sum up the fact that life is a bum trip and if one is to survive then he must do unto others before they do it to him. Jim's only regret is that he didn't treat Caroline more viciously right from the start, yet he has no regrets about how the affair ended.

Berlin is a chilling look at love through the eyes of hate, the ultimate in the death-rock genre. Yet throughout the LP Lou Reed does not allow the story to become too mawkish, there are no attempts to soften the blows or the impact of actions. It's a vision of twisted, ugly, sadistic and nightmarish perversion that makes the whole idea of love impossible because, by his inference, love is a parasitical process between two leeches with the strongest one surviving.

The musical excellence of this album owes a lot to the sidemen, who are members of Procol Har-um, Traffic, the Strawbs and Cream, and to Reed's skill as a weaver of webs that tighten around the listenser, and keep him captivated. Berlin spreads and grows on you like a cancer and it doesn't take much to enjoy it and even laugh along for, after all, it isn't real. Or is it? Buy it for your loved one(s).

Focus fails to work together

Live at the Rainbow
Focus
Sire (Polydor); $8.29

I had the opportunity of seeing Focus when they played in Toronto last November, and this album only served to confirm my initial impressions of the band. There is no denying that the members of Focus, Jan Akkerman on lead guitar, Bert Rutler on bass, Pierre van der Linden the drummer and Thijs van Leer on flute, organ and vocals, are excellent musicians per se, but their overall aims seem confused and muddled. They appear to be caught between the desire to play their own classically oriented compositions and rock tunes.

On side one there are three extended compositions, "Focus III", "Answers? Questions? Questions?
Answers!" and "Focus II", that give Akkerman lots of room to fiddle around with the strings of his guitar—without accomplishing very much. He seems so busy, trying to show off his speed and dexterity, that the rest of the band is ham-strung and flounders around filling in the gaps. Whatever potential ideas might have evolved during the concert are obscured by the lack of direction.

Side two opens with "Eruption", a collection of themes created by van Leer, thus allowing him to push Akkerman aside and demonstrate his skill with the organ and flute. But again the group fails to act as a unit, it tends to alternate the showcasing of Akkerman or van Leer, to their own detriment. But, just when all appears lost and the band out of focus, they break into "Hocus Pocus", to the roaring approval of the audience, and follow it with "Sylvia". These two songs make the album worthwhile because, at least, the whole band becomes involved and, as drummer van der Linden sets the furious pace, Focus is perfect.

Akkerman proves he can play clear patterns by matching van Leer's amazing yodelling note by note, while bassist Rutler fills out the bottom. With a reprise of "Hocus Pocus" it becomes obvious that Focus has great potential, but they have to overcome their divisive aims and settle down.

How many ways can a white boy say "I got the blues"?

Blues bands have never really been the rage. They did mount an impressive following in the mid '60's with most of the interest centred on the white imitators rather than the black originators. But the interest has since peaked and most of the bands that appeared after Paul Butterfield achieved success, white bands like those of Charlie Musselwhite, Barry Goldberg, Mike Bloomfield's Electric Flag and the Seigal-Schwallow Band, have since disbanded or disappeared.

Despite the seeming loss of favour, LP's by three blues bands have appeared during the past month or so. Two of the bands represented are hangovers from the halcyon days of old; the other is a new addition.

It All Comes Back Paul Butterfield's Better Days Bearsville/WEA; $6.29

It was Paul Butterfield, who first opened a lot of eyes and ears to the urban blues that grew out of the streets of Chicago's south side. After about six years fronting an everchanging band, Butterfield seemingly gave everything up and went into retreat in Woodstock, New York. He re-emerged last year with a new band called Better Days. The feeling of the group was mellower and more sophisticated, with Butterfield playing a more supportive role in the overall sound.

It All Comes Back, is in many ways a regression for Butterfield. A lot of the mellowness, and easy flowing feeling of the last album Better Days, is gone. That's coincident to a tradeoff in roles between Butterfield and singer Geoff Muldaur. While Better Days has a strong Muldaur influence, It All Comes Back is powered by Butterfield.

Songs like, "Too Many Drivers", "Win or Lose" and "Take Your Pleasure Where You Find It" (the last two were co-authored by Butterfield) are in the old Butter style—tough blues, with raucy vocals and harp lines spat out with an extra edge on them. But weaknesses abound. It sounds like the band has a lot of trouble dealing with its diversity. When one member's giving it all he's got, the others just seem to be playing along out of obligation rather than desire. The distinctive sound of Amos Garrett's almost polite '40's and '50's guitar riffs are rarely even heard on the record.

Then too, there are a few songs that are just out of place. Side two is almost a write off because of two such songs. Six minutes of precious groove space is thrown away on the cha-cha rhythmized title track, "It All Comes Back" and "Louisiana Flood", reinforces my feeling that Dr. John should stop pushing his songs on just about everyone he meets. Likewise, "Small Town Talk", co-written by Rick Danko of the Band and Bobby Charles, is a pleasant enough tune, perfect for Geoff Muldaur's voice but it really belongs on a solo LP.

The best cuts, the traditional tune, "Poor Boy" and Mose Allison's "If You Live" are sparsely instrumented and arranged.

This is one of the few times that Butterfield has played with the same band on two consecutive LP's. Better Days is among the best of the Butterfield groups and it's hoped that they develop some unity in purpose. We'll get a chance to check on their progress when they come to Convocation Hall in one week.

953 West The Siegel-Schwallow Band Wooden Nickel/RCA; $6.29

I'd almost forgotten about the Siegel-Schwallow Band until they appeared on Selji Ozawa's recording of Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra early last year. The band never sounded better and my interest was tickled.

The group has always been made up of Jim Schwall, and Corky Siegel, plus a bassist and drummer (those positions are presently occupied by Rollow Radford and Sheldon Plotkin, respectively). Their sound it turns out hasn't changed at all in eight years.

As a blues band from Chicago, I'd always thought them an anomaly. They must have been the group that Muddy Waters thought of when he made the remark about whites being able to play the blues "technically" but never being able to sing from the soul like a black man. I like the sound of Siegel's harp and bouncy barrel-house piano and Schwall's guitar but they sound more like fans of Jim Kweskin's Jug Band than Muddy Waters. Because their voices aren't really suited to the down-home dirty blues, the mostly original songs have more of a good time quality.

One of the tunes on 953 West, "reed Zone" written and sung by Siegel was "Psychiatric Institution Blues". It's probably no mere coincidence that there's a tune called "Indiana Psychiatric Institution Blues" (also composed and sung by Corky Siegel) on the circa 1966 Vanguard LP, Say Siegel-Schwallow. The words aren't identical but close, and both are 12-bar blues in the same key. Strangely, the guitar riffs are more inventive on the earlier version. Recycled songs?

First Time Out James Montgomery Band Capricorn/WEA; $6.29

A new blues band in 1974. And out of Boston? It's almost a contradiction in terms.

But hold on. James Montgomery is just not quite a blues band. It's only semantics, but this sixpiece band seems more like a merger of Paul Butterfield, Eric Clapton, Chicago, War and large doses of the J. Gells Band and Downchild. It's hard to decide between rejoicing and being sick.

The musicianship is intriguingly good. It has to be to cover that many styles. James Montgomery plays great harp, very reminiscent of J. Gells' Magic Dick. Peter Malick's guitar and David Case's keyboard work are equally deserving of praise. It's a good showcase LP and a solid but not outstanding debut. The lack of continuity between musical styles will probably drive away more listeners than it'll attract.

The group should expand its ideas in a more well defined direction. Songs like "I'm Funky But I'm Clean" and "Everybody Knows the Answer" are more than enough incentive to look out for a sequel to First Time Out.

Pianist Barenboim slugs out sensitive Brahms

Brahms: Variations for Piano
Daniel Barenboim, piano
DG 2530335

There once was a time when an artist could be thought of in terms of one record label. Toscanini was sole property of RCA, Leonard Bernstein was in Columbia's corner, Otto Klemperer's work was the sole property of Angel, Von Karajan working only for Deutsche Grammophon. Well, times have changed, and as far as this reviewer is concerned it's all for the better.

Since his discovery a few years back, Daniel Barenboim has been one of the newer stars in the Angel roster, yet DG has won him away for a series of fine recordings, featuring him in his role as conductor and pianist. Barenboim is first a pianist, though, and if anyone doubts that I can highly recommend this new record.

which features the well-known Variations and Fugue on a theme by Handel, the 16 variations on a theme by Schumann, and the rarely-heard "Theme and Variations", the theme being from the composer's Sextet op. 18.

This is a side of Barenboim which I'd like to hear more of. His readings of the variations (particularly the Handel set) are sensitive and lyrical. Those with a taste for the all-stops-out, thundering-up-and-down-the-keyboard school of piano will probably be disappointed, but then again, there are some pianists who take that approach to the same music. Having heard Barenboim in a Massey Hall recital here a couple of years ago, this disc only confirms my respect for the man. What I'd like DG to come up with now is a recording of the books of Paganini variations, music that has not had a good recording for some time now, and a player with Barenboim's sensitivity is just the man to do it.

A word or two should be said about DG's technical efforts on this record. They've managed to cram about 31 minutes onto each side, over an hour in total. If they keep this up, my respect for them will increase, too, for it wasn't all that long ago that the same company issued a recording of Beethoven sonatas with Michelangeli playing. One side of the disc held a scant 15 minutes of music (albeit very well played) but the rest was a mirror-bright field of unused vinyl. It's eminently clear that in these shortage-plagued times that sort of practice cannot continue, and if this present disc is any indication, DG is to be commended for giving a little better value for their premium price than they have in the past.

As for Barenboim's work—let's have some more, soon!

Brahms: he would have liked the record.

Croce's assault on rock stardom continues despite death

I Got a Name
Jim Croce
Dunhill/ABC

Jim Croce is dead. So is late '50s rock legend Buddy Holly. Croce died in small plane crash. So did Holly.

But similarities don't stop there. Holly's death occurred just at the point when the Texas-born singer was about to shoot into stardom. Croce too had just made it into the big time when his plane crashed (with hit singles like "Operator" and "You Don't Mess around with Him").

Strangely enough, the type of song Croce's name became synonymous with, such as "Bad Bad Leroy Brown" is hardly indicative of the quality or the sensibility of the material that fills out his limited three-album discography. A song such as the current hit "Time In A Bottle", culled from the earliest album is quite a remove from the raucy up-tempo, leg-slapping sound of Croce's very autobiographical forays into the "south side of Chicago" or Sunday afternoons as a dirt-track hero in a '57 Chevrolet. The style of "Time" and "A Long Time Ago" reveals a side of Jim Croce that will surprise many. There's a

James Taylor simplicity and an intricate interplay of rhythm and second guitars throughout the albums, reminiscent of the Red Shea period in Lightfoot's album sequence. (Shea and John Stockfish were so integral to Lightfoot's sound that they're back on most of the cuts on his latest album, Sundown.)

Croce's second and third albums Life and Times and I Got a Name are also produced by the team of Terry Cashman and Tommy West. Contributing to the James Taylor tightness of the backings, along with the fingerboard artistry of Meuhlielsen, are Tommy West's keyboards, the drumming of Gary Chester (who, on the third album gave way on several cuts to other percussionists Rick Marotta and Steve Gadd) and bassist Joe Macho, who does most of the work on the first two albums, and is joined by Stu Woods on the third set.

Life and Times contains Croce's concert favourite "Roller Derby Queen". The story is about falling in love with a five-foot six mama who is toughness in every pore of her 215 pounds. In this same genre of tunes inspired by Croce's life as a trucker and construction worker is the song which really served as the consolidating effort in Jim's assault on rock stardom—"Bad Bad Leroy Brown". Along with this exuberant tribute to a crap-shooting, Eldorado-driving dude, goes the irrepressible ballad of "Speedball Tucker". A number of ballads rival the up-tempo cuts with genuine feeling and lyric simplicity that reveal a musical talent that will sorely be missed.

"Dreamin' Again", which floats along on Meuhlielsen's soft touch of acoustic guitar, paired with "Alabama Rain" represents the true portrait of Jim Croce's ability to take the stuff of nostalgia—Drive-In movies, Friday nights/Drinkin' beer and laughin'—and mold it into a pop song. "Next Time; This Time" is a song composed of trite sayings such as—Cause woman starlin' right now / I'm gonna forget your name and your pretty face, girl / And write you off as a bad mistake.

The posthumous issue of I Got a Name with its title cut being featured in the flick The Last American Hero represents the third and final Croce album which Dunhill/ABC Records has in its catalogue. At the time of Buddy Holly's death the number of albums which had been released as solo Holly efforts or Crickets collaborations was infinitesimal compared to the Holly catalogue today.

So it may be expected that out-takes, obscure session work, and covers of contemporary hits may be dug out of the vaults of Dunhill's archives and released in yet another posthumous album. It will have to be a superlative effort to outshine Croce's third, however. Songs like "Lover's Cross", and "Age" are as good as anything Croce has left us-and on these compositions he pays quite a debt to Lightfoot, even though it may be attributed to similar sensibilities, and not to any conscious plagiaristic writing. In fact, Croce's writing on the piano-backed "Salon and Saloon" is tendered in the appealing nostalgia of a Harry Nilsson or Randy Newman ballad.

From funk to folksy San Francisco Bay Blues-good-time rockers, to the subtle shadings of plaintive ballads, Jim Croce has realized one of his ambitions—now that he's "Got a Name" we're the only one who can benefit from his many years of struggle to produce the three albums that we only have to place a needle on to appreciate.

Opening tonight at 9 pm is Black Theatre Canada's premiere production of Malinche or Heart of A Child. Black Theatre Canada intends to present plays that will identify with the predominantly West Indian culture of Toronto's black citizens. They are to be found at the Old Church Theatre in Bathurst Street United Church. Coming up next week on the St. Lawrence Centre stage is Michael Cook's historic drama Colour the Flesh the Colour of Dust. Set in St. John's Newfoundland in 1762, the play tells the story of the English forces in Newfoundland succumbing to a French attack. Speedy political turnabouts take place both then and later when the British fleet recaptures the town - the game being one of personal and economic survival. The play previews Saturday and Monday with opening night Tuesday February 12th.

Toronto Workshop Productions' interpretation of Barry Bradfoot's Ten Lost Years did not open last week as definitively stated in this column but is slated to be in performance this week. The play deals with Canada's own during the depression years. Another new production this week is Red Emma at the Toronto Free Theatre. Fiery Emma Goldman is a Russian born, American anarchist who started organizing both her life and other people at a tender but tough seventeen years of age. Phone 368-2856 for reservations.

Something to look out for is a subsidiary production of the Tarragon Theatre Blitzkrieg, a play about Hitler and Eva. It will be performed at the Poor Alex Theatre starting February 16. Previews are February 14 and 15 at 8:45 pm and Sunday matinees at 2:30 pm will be pay-what-you-can.

Now playing at Hart House Theatre is a production of Sandy Wilson's The Boy Friend. Presented by the Vic Music Club, the show continues until Saturday February 9th.

and the time is 8 pm Monday. Tickets are $2 at the door.

Stringband who've been gathering a lot of Journalistic praise this year for their new LP Canadian Sunset, are at Egerton's, 70 Gerrard at Church, tonight and tomorrow.

SRO Production presents Spirit at the Victory tomorrow for three shows, at 5, 8 and 11 pm. This is not really the same band that cut songs like, "Nature's Way", "Animal Zoo" or "Mechanical World". The reformed Spirit contains only one original member, drummer Ed Cassidy. Tickets are $4.50 plus tax.

An interesting new concept in film comes to the Yonge Theatre on Thursday. Cin-a-Rock will attempt to merge a rock festival documentary-drama with live-on stage rock performances. The film called Free, is about the confrontation between a group of "revolutionaries" and the backers of a festival. The footage, taken at the 1970 "Peoples Festival" on Randall's Island (in the East River just off Harlem), includes performances of Hendrix Van Morrison, Steppenwolf, Dr. John and Mountain.

In addition to the film, there will be a live segment with the Ozark Mountain Daredevils and Barefoot (Formerly Atkinson, Danko and Ford). The show goes on twice a night, at 6 and 10 pm for one week. All seats are $4.40.

The Ozark Mountain Daredevils are a six-man country rock band who've just completed their first album for A&M. Four of the members have contributed compositions to make up the complement of 10 original songs. The music is, for the most part, acoustic, making use of guitars, fiddle, dulcimer, autoharp, mandolin, keyboards and even saw. It's a pleasant marriage of the musical sensibilities of the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band and the spirit of the Allman Brothers Band. Unfortunately individual brilliance is almost non-existent. Steve Cash, who's Jimmie Fadden (of the Dirt Band)-style harmonica dominates most cuts, is the only outstanding member.

The songs range from foot stompers like, "Black Sky", "Standing On A Rock", and "If you Want To Get To Heaven" to ballads like "Within Without", which could have easily been part of Bread's repertoire. Production was handled by David Anderle and Glyn Johns, names usually associated with Rita Coolidge and the Rolling Stones, respectively.

Piano supernova Vladimir Ashkenazy makes one of his annual appearances with the TSO next Tuesday and Wednesday at Massey Hall; try the rush seats on this one. Speaking of rush seats, the National Ballet reports almost complete sell-outs for most of the evenings El Rudolfo is dancing. Still, there are some left in the odd one or two seats. Go to the box-office now—don't waste any time, because showtime there'll probably be no ducats left at all.

My mistake dept: London Records' classical manager writes to inform me that in my recent review of Solli's "Chicago Showcase" album I gave out some wrong information about the maestro's duties these days. OK, London, here are his present tasks: Musical Director of the Chicago Symphony, guest conductor of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, music adviser to the Paris Opera, music director of L'Orchestre de Paris, and principal guest conductor of the London Philharmonic. Whew...and you think you carry a load with five courses!

CBC shows this week (aside from the usual drive!) include Zara Nelsova, cello with Grant Johannessen, piano in a recital Tuesday at 8:30 pm. This husband-and-wife team performs all over the world and has been hailed as the world's finest 'cello-piano team'. The program includes Beethoven's D Major Sonata, and music by Casadesu and Rachmaninoff, the last piece honouring the centennial of the composer's birth.

This Sunday Night at 8:30, pianist Rosemary Griffith gives a recital of Schubert, Chopin, Brahms, Schumann, Debussy and Henry Mancini(?) in a benefit for the Toronto Art Therapy Institute. Location is the First Unitarian Church at 185 St. Clair Ave. W., and students get in for $1.50. An interesting program, with proceedings going to a very worthy cause.

Classical music buffs, contrary to a public image that emphasises dour looks and a serious nature, are as fond as a laugh as anyone. And the recent history of humor-in-concert shows this up. The famous Hofnung Music Festivals, ably documented on Angel records, featured events like "Let's Fake An Opera" and the concert for Vacuum Cleaner and orchestra. Peter Schickele has been touring for years as the present-day resurrection of P.D.Q. Bach, and the great Anna Russell has been a legend in her own time with her incredible send-ups of singers. The tenor, she relates, sounds as impressive as he does by using the empty space between her best numbers involves a retelling of the story of Wagner's Ring cycle, which sound ridiculous enough when you tell it straight. All this leads me up to say that this great lady will be in town on the 25th (get your tickets now, as it's bound to be sold out) at St. Lawrence. If you've ever felt a desire for someone to take the wind out of the sails of stuck-up vocalists, flock down to see Anna Russell.

The Riverboat, 134 Yorkville (922-3714), features Tommy Makem, of the Clancy Brothers tonight through Sunday. Bruce Cockburn is appearing next week starting Wednesday through Saturday. It's a benefit performance to help the Riverboat out of a financial bind. Advance tickets for Cockburn's 2 nightly shows at 8:30 and 11 pm are available at Eaton's Ticket Attractions on College Street. The tickets are all $3.50 and Eaton is waving their usual surcharge as a favour to the "Boat". I'm told that over a half the tickets have already been sold.

Joni Mitchell is appearing in Kitchener tomorrow and at Massey Hall on Sunday. Both shows are completely sold out.

The more feminine half of Delaney and Bonney, Bonnie Bramlett, is upstairs at the El Mocambo, tonight and tomorrow. Bonnie who split from her spouse about a year ago and already has a solo album out on Columbia, is being backed by a nine-piece band. English traditional folk rock, in the form of Fairport Convention with Sandy Denny, open on Monday for three days only.

Paul Butterfield's Better Days and Stringband are in concert at Convocation Hall next Friday. Tickets for the two shows at 6 and 10 pm are very reasonable at $4, and are available at the SAC office.

Massey lost their three games with Eng I. Engineer Kenstatts walloped Storey, 15-5, 15-9. Tipoff lost his first encounter with Bishop, 9-15, but managed to win the next two 15-14, 15-12 to take the set. Miller fought out a 15-13, 15-6 round with Yen to put the Engineers in the winning spot.

Round two of the playoffs was played on Thursday.

Law A emerged victorious over Dent, in a match score of 3-0. In the individual games, it was Sweezy over Virtue, 2-1, Gregory over Tammsalm 2-0, and Morrison over Stranks, 2-0.

PHE beat Wyc two games to one. Prettie and Woods were the winning jocks, Wilbe downing Stableworth for Wyc.

Swimmers and divers win

By JANET CLARKE

In a double dual swimming and diving meet held Monday night in Waterloo, the University of Toronto team scored an upset victory over Western and Waterloo.

In the 400 medley relay, Waterloo placed first. Toronto women Wyllie, Kitchen Gibson, and Bays came third in a field of four.

The 200 free saw Stratton, Toronto (2:15.5) in first place. Biggs (2:35.7) was in sixth place. In the second heat, Toronto swimmers Shore (2:43.7) and Sykes (2:57.5) took fifth and sixth spots.

In the 50 free, Mathieu, of Waterloo, (27.9) squeaked by Toronto's Schmidt by one second to take first place. Drohan, swimming for Toronto, placed fifth (29.5). In heat two, Toronto managed to take third, as Stewart finished with an even 30.0 time. Williams, also representing Toronto, completed the field of six with a time of 32.8.

In diving, Toronto women took the two top spots. Henry racked up 150.45. Milburn trailed along in second place with a low 130.8. Allen, the only other Toronto diver to make the top ten, scored 105.36 to take seventh place.

Mathieu of Waterloo, took the 100 meter butterfly in 1:07.4. Thomson of Toronto came third with 1:12.8 and Craft was fifth with 1:18.6.

Murray of Waterloo took top honors in the 100 free (59.2). Toronto placed third and fifth (Schmidt, 1:03.5 and Drohan 1:05.8). In heat two, Toronto's Stewart (1:11.7) and Sykes (1:20.5) placed fifth and sixth.

Murray of Waterloo also took the 200 backstroke with a time of 2:28.5. Thomson (2:43.9) and Posen (2:47.1) were fourth and fifth.

Murray continued her winning streak by taking the 400 free by a considerable amount. The closest swimmer to her 4:30.9 was Toronto's Stratton with 5:18.8. In the second heat, Biggs (5:36.2) and Shore (5:56.5) came third and fourth after two Waterloo girls.

Wright of Toronto broke through the flanks of the Waterloo attack, to take first place in the 200 breaststroke, with a time of 2:34.1. Dobell placed fifth (3:08.4) and Olsheski (3:14.1) in second and third spots.

Henry was another one of the Toronto team who managed to make it to the top. She made her 3 meter dives to rack up 143.70, which was way out ahead of second place Blair of Western's 121.80. Toronto also took fourth and seventh places with the performances of Allen (101.5) and Milburn (102.85).

Stratten, McCormick Wright and Schmidt combined their talents to streak past the Waterloo team, 4:09.2 to 4:21.7.

The diving team is preparing for the first annual University of Toronto diving meet to be held in the Benson Building Saturday. Divers from Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and the U.S. will be competing in the meet which begins at 9 am and finishes at midnight.

Waterpolo results

By MIKE MILNE

With several shaky weeks of play completed, the water polo league appears to be running smoothly, although some of the games were not as close as expected.

The only game thus far was a loosely played 8-8 tie between PHE and Knox last Wednesday. The goal scorers, unfortunately, were not recorded. In the other first division game last week, Trin defaulted to Vic I (yet another default!)

This week saw Know edge Vic I 12-0 (the Knox scorers were not listed, but we know who didn't score for Vic). Eng I defeated Trin 8-4. Butler, Singer and Elden divided up the Eng's goals while some hotdog got the four Trin goals.

In second division play, the top three teams enhanced their playoff hopes by winning their games last week. No games were played last night due to the swim meet.

Meds defeated Eng II 9-3 (once again, the goal scorers were not recorded). New defeated Wye 12-5. Fremes and H Janssen scored four each. Stefanyh (2), Lauris and Wilkins also scored for New. Schulman (3), Hogan and Jones scored for Wye.

Vic II trounced Dent 13-2. Zimmerman and Sebben scored four each, with Hibberb (2), Lawson, Mayberry and Mariani also scoring. Peeling and Schulman scored for Dents.

Dear Steven,

As you know, your mother and I have made great sacrifices to send you through college. The very idea of you asking us if we can send you to Europe this summer is outrageous. The nerve! Your mother and I haven't had a vacation in the last 5 years.

But knowing you, you'll get yourself to Europe some way or other. Well to show you we do want you to enjoy yourself like the other kids, I've sent this STUDENT-RAILPASS coupon your mother clipped out. Because you're a student under 26, you can get unlimited second-class rail travel in 13 countries for up to 2 months for only $165. The trains are clean, modern, punctual, fast, and comfortable. So once you get over there you can see Europe as cheaply as possible.

By the way get your STUDENT-RAILPASS here; you can't buy it in Europe. It's a great deal Steve—tax free and one beautiful way to beat currency fluctuations.

Now there are two things I suggest you do. First, send in the coupon so you can buy the ticket. Second, start saving your money.

Love,
Dad

A nostalgic look at interfac hockey

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Since it's been officially declared "nostalgia year at U of T" (Varsity, Feb. 4), we thought we'd wax nostalgic about the beginning of the week. (Can you remember that far back?

Those were golden days and the book that best typified the period was a bestseller called Crapablanca. It tells of the bittersweet romance of a hardened sportswriter, Rick and a beautiful Varsity copyrunner Isla.

It's set in the dark days of February 1974. The newspaper, like all other institutions on campus, is threatened by a wave of mindless political terror, under the direction of major Bob Bettson, who is attempting to become the next Varsity editor.

Here, then, are a few excerpts from that famous story of love, intrigue and the interfac hockey scores.

"Why weren't you on the Varsity's back-page Monday and Wednesday," asked Yvonne wistfully, looking at her half-finished drink.

Rick laughed turning his back to her. "That's so long ago, I don't remember."

Yvonne didn't give up. "Oh Rick, tell me the interfac hockey results."

Rick took another drink and replied matter-of-factly: "Vic II and SMC B tied 3 all. Lewis, Tappe and Sheehan scored for Vic while Mulhern, Boat and Fitzpatrick tallied for the mikes."

"Law I dowed Sr. Eng on goals by Hynes (2), Hutchison, McDonald, Morrison, and Zimmerman. Joyce scored for the engineers."

"SMC A lost 3-1 to some wild men from the hills of Erin. Werbicki netted the losers' goal while Erin's scores were Sloane, Brewer and Lewchuck."

"Grad's II returned to school where the teachers from Fac Ed declared open house on them 14-2. Some doubting Thomas scored twice for the Grads. McKenzie (2), Glynn (3), White, Dougie, Chuik, Clarke and Jacobs provided the slim margin of victory for the teachers."

Yvonne interrupted, "Oh Rick, enough of this. Will I see you tonight?"

Rick replied matter-of-factly, "I don't know, I never make plans that far ahead."

....

Renault turned to Rick and introduced him to Major Bettson.

Renault said, "We are very honored tonight, Rick. Major Bettson is one of the reasons this year's Varsity enjoys the reputation it has today."

Major Bettson smiled, "You repeat 'this year's Varsity' as though you expected there to be others."

"Oh that's right," Renault frowned, "I forgot that you're going to run for editor next year."

"Anyway," said the Major, with cold Germanic charm, "we'd like to ask you a few questions, unofficially of course. What were the hockey scores last week?"

Rick leaked pokerface: "PHE B dropped a 4-2 decision to Trin A. Theodore, Torn, Phalin and Sykes for Trin outscored PHE's Browne and Meheew."

"Pharmacy defeated a drgged Music team 12-0. Billings, Heatherington (4), Walt, two different guys named Walker. Rando and Marling dispensed patent medicines and goals indiscriminately for the druggists."

"Jr. Engineers downed Innis I 3-1 (2) and Sekington blasted the engineer's goals while Macaulay counted one for Innis."

"Scar II shutout New II 3-0. Tutors, Rockford and Nash scored a goal each for Scar. The referee wrote on the scoresheet: 'I gave a game misconduct to 16 Weizel game misconduct to 16 Weizel for spitting on me from the penalty bench.'"

Major Bettson turned red in the face and roared, "Enough of your decadent sardonic humor, swine! When the Third Reich takes over the Varsity next year, we'll break into the first meeting you have and get rid of you and all the other riff-raff!"

The Varsity—Alan McMillan

As UC players watch dumbfounded, Pharm shoots into an open net. Pharm won 12-0.

Rick just leaned over his typewriter and laughed.

Isla walked into the Varsity newsroom and asked Sam "Where's Rick?"

Sam evaded her anxious gaze, "I don't know. I ain't seen him all night."

"Oh Sam! Stop working on that book review, will you, and type these hockey scores?"

"Sure, Miss Isla," said Sam softly, "What are they?"

"Well, Sam," said Isla dreamily, "Law II defeated Vic II 6-1. Phillips, Sheehan, Teolis, Whyte and Loebart tallied for Law while young Turk replied for Vic."

"PHE A edged UC I 8-1. Croke (4), Ackley (2), Bagg and Corrigan splurged for the jocks while Graham kept a stiff upper lip while scoring UC's lone goal."

"SMC A downed Meds A 4-3 on efforts by Flynn, Tate and Botzozowicz. The doctors nursed along their effort on goals by Goroon, Drummond and Davies."

As Sam finished typing it up, Isla Says, "Sam, type up 'As Deadlines Go By,' will you? Just once, for old times sake."

Sam looks up with a start. "I can't remember it, Miss Isla, I'm a little rusty on it."

"I'll hum it for you," says Isla "you must remember this, a kiss is just a kiss, a by-line's just a by-line."

Sam begins to type, singing to himself.

"Oh there you are, Rick. I didn't see you hiding behind the Telex machine," said Isla. "Have you been trying to avoid me?"

"No," said Rick, "I've just been working on the interfac scores."

"I know how you must feel about me after I ran out on you but can't you put your feelings aside. I never would have come back to work as a copyrunner if I'd known you were going to be here."

Then Isla breaks down. "Oh I don't know what's right any longer. You'll have to think for both of us, for all of us. No one can stop the Major now."

Rick raised his glass. "Here's looking at you, kid. Don't worry about the Major."

"Oh Rick, cheer me up," Isla said, sobbing in his arms. "Tell me some more hockey results, before I have to leave for the printing plant."

"Sure," said Rick, "Vic I defeated Dent A 3-1. Telford, Biblecki (known in the Strand as 'Bielecki'), and McWarter scored Vic's goals while Nabeta replied for the dentists."

"Jr. Engineers slaughtered Fac Ed 9-1. Klanko, Dimarco, Sekington, Kennedy, Valianes, Large and Raven outscored an unknown teacher."

....

Rick said, "Isla, you have to go now, before Bettson learns about what we've done"

"But what about us?" said Isla. "We'll always have Crapablanca. We got it back last night when we were laying out the sports page" said Rick. "But you've got to go now or the world will never know the interfac hockey scores."

"I'm no good at being noble but it doesn't take much to see that the problems of two people don't amount to a pile of beans in this crazy world. Someday you'll understand that. Not now, here's looking at you, kid." Rick raised his glass.

Rick and Renault watched the taxi carrying Isla and the sports scores drive off for the printing plant. It was miles away and Bettson's forces couldn't reach it now.

Renault finally spoke, "You'd better disappear from Crapablanca for awhile. There's a free French garrison over at Fort Book. I could be induced to arrange a passage. But first, who won between Erin and the Grads?"

"It's a deal," said a weary Rick. "Erin beat Grad I 2-0 on goals by Sloane and Wilson, while Hanes got the shutout. Now, how soon do we leave for Fort Book?"

Twice for Luck

Ray Chapman, former star shortstop of the Cleveland Indians, batted second in Cleveland's line-up. In one game, during the 1920 season, he went to bat twice and got two hits, each a double. He stole two bases and scored two runs. In the field, he made two put-outs, two assists and two errors. In two unoffical times at bat he was struck by pitched balls — the second of these killed him.

Sharp stalls on Vietnam prisoners issue: MP's

External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp has stalled three months on a request by 13 MPs which urged Canada to bring the issue of political prisoners in South Vietnam before the United Nations.

Andrew Brewin (NDP—Greenwood) told a Saturday audience at OISE: "He does not want to say no (to the request) but he is getting advice to say no."

Brewin was among the 13 MPs who gave Sharp a brief in November urging Canada to take the issue to the UN Human Rights Commission, but Sharp, even after a deputation by the all-party group of MPs has not announced any decision.

"Sharp first said we had no legal right to do that," Brewin said, "but we got him off that."

Brewin explained Sharp's advisors had told him international law prevented such a move on behalf of the political prisoners, but the MPs convinced Sharp otherwise.

Brewin said Sharp replied "Why should we do it?" If it is such an important issue, Brewin quoted Sharp as saying, "Why hasn't some other country done it already?"

Another NDP MP, Doug Rowland, (Selkirk), who returned from South Vietnam 10 days ago, said South Vietnamese civilians gave him the estimate of about 200,000 political prisoners currently being held.

The Thieu regime says there are no official political prisoners, but two years ago all prisoners arrested on political grounds were reclassified as "criminals" on orders from Thieu.

Rowland said he spoke with eight released political prisoners after going through what he described as "spy-novel" security because the released prisoners were afraid of re-arrest if caught talking with a foreigner.

Rowland said he was told about 60 per cent of those held were in jail because they were pacifists or members of groups which supported neither Thieu or the Provisional Revolutionary Government (PRG).

Another 25 per cent, Rowland said he was told, were held for "anti-government activities" which Rowland described as peace marches such as have occurred in Toronto.

The remaining 15 per cent, he said, were probably PRG members or supporters.

One of the ex-prisoners Rowland talked to was student who had been in jail eight and a half years, two of them in tiger cages. The student was crippled in both legs because he had been shot in the upper part of both legs while imprisoned.

Another was a businessman who had been imprisoned two years and had two sons in jail, one for two years and the other for 25 years.

Rowland said the businessman reported after the January, 1973, ceasefire accords were signed there were demonstrations in the prisons by prisoners demanding their release as provided for in the accords, but jail guards shot and killed many prisoners instead.

Both Rowland and Brewin said Sharp will have to be pushed into a position of taking the issue to the UN.

"Canada, like Sweden, is a country that could develop international law along humanitarian concerns," Brewin said. "The sheer size, scale and enormity of the political prisoners issue is bigger than any other concern."

"Even the most cynical could see world opinion could help."

Both supported the letter writing campaign organized by the International Committee to Free South Vietnamese Political Prisoners from

Detention, Torture and Death, a group working out of the Canadian Council of Churches office on St. Clair Avenue.

A representative of that committee, Ann Buttrick, told how she tried to enter South Vietnam in January and was held in a South Vietnamese police station for 27 hours.

During that time, she and her husband, Frank, were found to be on a list of persons prohibited from entering South Vietnam, and they were promptly deported to Bangkok, Thailand.

US wanted money for S. Vietnam

Canada was approached by the US last fall to give money to the government of South Vietnam's President Thieu, but so far Canada has turned the request down.

This fact was revealed during weekend speeches by York University professor Gabriel Kolko and NDP MP Douglas Rowland (Selkirk).

Kolko said the US called a meeting of the World Development Bank and the Asian Development Bank October 14 in Paris to ask the western countries represented for a total of $500 million to help prop up the sagging Thieu regime.

Countries represented included Canada, France Australia, England, Sweden and West Germany. According to Rowland and Kolko, all the countries turned the US down.

Currently the US is pouring $790 million per year into Thieu's government, Kolko said, but he added the US figures Thieu needs $500 million more per year but the US cannot afford to foot the increased bill at this time.

By MARILYN EMERSON

A student union meeting today at the Faculty of Social Work could change the faculty's present program—if faculty representatives show up.

Members of the student union have long been disappointed with the faculty's present program and past efforts on their part to alter the program have been passed off by faculty.

Basically what the students want is a more flexible program and representation on decision-making committees.

On January 29 the student union formulated a statement of demands which was submitted to faculty and field instructors.

Students demanded a written reply to their demands by February 4 and presence of faculty representatives at a student union meeting February 5 "to answer questions of clarification."

In response to the union's statement of demands, the secretariat of the student union was invited to meet with faculty representatives.

At that meeting the faculty refused to discuss the demands of the union. The faculty were willing only to talk of the "issues behind the actual demands."

The meeting closed with faculty representatives recognizing the union's mandate to clarify demands.

Dean Rose said the faculty would probably meet collectively and determine their response, if any.

At the February 5 meeting no faculty representatives showed up nor had the union received the requested written reply to their demands from the faculty.

The student union proceeded to appoint a negotiating committee of five students.

The negotiating committee was then given the mandate to engage in negotiations only if they were in receipt of a written reply from the faculty by 1 pm today.

The faculty meets Thursdays. By Friday morning the student union had still not received their requested written reply.

Under the present system there are four "policy committees" with student parity. Important issues are discussed here but no decisions are made.

The student union is demanding student parity on all committees making decisions on hiring, firing, tenure, appointments and admissions.

On January 22 the student union, had removed all students from the policy committees.

In order to realize a more equitable re-distribution of power the union asks a parity faculty council be established replacing the old policy committees.

"Professional values" is a required course at the faculty. Students feel this course is too rigid and narrow.

Students want to broaden the areas of discussion within the course and be allowed more time to generate their own ideas.

Students demand the present structure of the values classes be amended to allow them the option to leave their present groups, without penalty, and set up their own organized seminars and workshops.

Impatient with faculty stalling the student union has scheduled an "alternative values class" to begin Tuesday and be open to all interested students.

Stanfield flails away at savings bond

By MIKE EDWARDS

Taking a cautious theoretical stroll through the garden of Canadian economic policy, Robert Stanfield, chief bus-driver for the Ottawa Tories, decided the major problem facing the average Canadian was an economically unsound savings bond.

Stanfield was speaking at the first annual Metro Toronto federal Progressive Conservative policy conference held Saturday at the Don Valley Holiday Inn.

He suggested the Canada Savings Bond should be pegged to the Consumer Price Index, and yield a nominal 4 per cent thereafter. Thus the purchasing power of the bond would remain the same and interest would be earned too. Wow!

The CPI rose 9.2 per cent last year. The CSB effective yield was 7.5 per cent.

"Canadians ought to have the right to plan their own future," he thundered "They are presently losing money on the bonds"

Despite gaping holes in his economic analysis, about 200 loyal fans cheered and hooted in appreciation of his speech.

Savings bonds are part of any government's fiscal policy. They are used to regulate the actual supply of money in circulation. Any increase in consumer savings will cause an economic downturn in the economy.

However, Stanfield launched scornful attacks on the Harvard school of economics in the form of federal money-man John Turner and the chief Liberal bus-driver Pierre Trudeau ("Wateringhole" in English).

Stanfield spent a portion of his speech applauding the democratic procedures of the Conservative Party. "It's wonderful to see you passing all these resolutions even if we (the caucus) don't pay any attention to them"

He compared the situation to any policy procedures in the Liberal Party. "Most of their time is taken up in introductions," he quipped.

Before the speech some notables in the audience were introduced: provincial education minister, Tom (Bill 274) Wells, Karl (back-of-the-bus) Mallette, and a smattering of MPs and MPPs. Notably absent was Ontario premier William Davis who appears to be the black sheep of the PC family.

"Fighting Bob" Stanfield clutches his banana before speaking.

Pub boycotts Carling-O'Keefe

BURNABY (CUP)—Beer and ale Produced by Carling O'Keefe Breweries Ltd. will no longer be sold in the Simon Fraser University student pub.

Last week, the pub management board, composed of students and administrators, agreed to a student council request that the company be boycotted because it has direct ownership links with racist South Africa.

Carling - O'Keefe, formerly Canadian Breweries Ltd., is owned by Rothman's of Pall Mall Ltd. Rothman's, through a number of intermediate corporations, is controlled by Rembrandt Tobacco Corporation of South Africa. Like many other companies, Rembrandt locates in South Africa to take advantage of cheap labor made possible by that country's racist social system.

Student council made their request two months ago but the management board had been waiting for a promised statement from Canadian Breweries who said they could prove they were not controlled from South Africa. But the statement never came.

PRG winning in South Vietnam, says prof

By DICK BROWN

Despite US president Richard Nixon's strategy of trying to split Russia and China in their support of Vietnam's Provisional Revolutionary Government (PRG), the PRG is winning in South Vietnam.

This conclusion came Saturday from York University's Vietnam expert Gabriel Kolko in a speech at OISE.

In summarizing the first year after the January, 1973, ceasefire accords in Vietnam, Kolko painted a picture of the PRG making political and economic gains in the countryside and Thieu retreating behind American supplied military might.

Meanwhile, Kolko said, US international diplomacy has moved in the direction of playing Russia off against China in an attempt to undercut their support for the PRG and North Vietnam.

The US diplomatic moves, led mainly by globe-trotting Henry Kissinger, have been only partially successful for the US, Kolko said, but even the limited success has allowed the US to continue to keep Thieu at a state of war.

By making offers of detente and ping-pong diplomacy, Kolko said the US has been able to get Russia and China to reduce their support of the revolutionary forces.

However, he said by March, 1973, this policy had proven unable to work for a number of reasons.

Because of hostility between Russia and China, if the US moves too close to one, the other will back off from close ties.

Likewise, Hanoi has announced, quite successfully according to Kolko, that any socialist country abandoning the Vietnamese liberation struggle could no longer be called a true socialist state.

That moral persuasion, Kolko says, is not only true but has helped to keep supplies and support flowing from Russia and China.

Meanwhile, in Vietnam, Thieu is in an increasingly bad situation since the ceasefire.

Despite "tens of thousands" of military actions by Thieu since the ceasefire, "the PRG has emerged from the Paris accords far stronger than it went in," he said.

The reason for this is a strategic coup by the PRG.

Kolko said the PRG has advocated a policy of "peace and reconciliation" since the accords, a policy which has gained considerable support because of Vietnamese exhaustion with 25 years of war against three invading forces, the Japanese, French and Americans.

Kolko, who recently returned from a visit to South Vietnam, said in the areas he visited the PRG was supporting families of soldiers serving in the Thieu military, rebuilding the mainly agrarian economy and building a medical infrastructure.

While the PRG has the military power to stage off attacks from Thieu forces and has done so for the last year successfully it has concentrated on setting up accommodation with local residents.

In the most northern province of South Vietnam, Quang Tri, Kolko said he saw 21 formal agreements of accommodation between the PRG and village authorities and "numerous informal agreements."

During last year's typhoon season, which Kolko said was unusually severe, the PRG was supplying the Thieu troops with food and medical supplies.

The Sanh is located in Quang Tri province, and in earlier years of the war was the site of bloody battles with thousands being killed.

"Despite the 'astounding destruction—you've got to see it to believe it,' Kolko said the PRG has built in one year 'an astonishing integrated, dynamic and progressive society.'"

"There are no signs of hunger and the market is full."

Kolko said the PRG now control more than half of the countryside, with the Thieu regime in control of mainly urban areas.

He claimed the Thieu regime would be unable to survive peace either politically or economically.

He said Thieu has backed himself into a position where his only option is military force, and even that probably will not last long as a third Thieu's army deserts every year.

By comparison, the rate of desertion from US armed forces during direct American military involvement in Vietnam rarely exceeded 10 per cent per year for the entire world-wide military complex.

Thieu's government requires imports of 450,000 tons of rice per year in a country which used to be able to export surplus rice.

The unemployment rate in the Thieu controlled region is 25 per cent due mainly to the refugees in urban areas.

While the US is underwriting the Thieu regime to the tune of $790 million per year, corruption has resulted in 10 devaluations of the South Vietnamese Piaster in the last year, Kolko said.

Troops whose pay once bought a month's worth of food now find a month's pay only covering 10 days' worth of food. This has been a contributory factor in the decline of Thieu's military position.

On top of this, Thieu is spending $500 million a year more than the US is giving him.

The Americans, Kolko said, are pushing Thieu to use his military strength, which includes the fourth-largest air force (American supplied, 2,100 planes) in the world.

Kolko said Thieu's options are limited to brute force, and while the CIA has pushed for a long time to have Thieu replaced with a less corrupt group of generals, that action would probably create a power vacuum in which no American-backed regime could stave off the PRG.

Back to the bathtub for Evans

Poor John Evans. Even a university president has to obey the laws of the land. So Dr. John will have to do without a swimming pool at his Rosedale mansion at 93 Highland Ave. However, Evans received a sympathetic ear from the businessmen at business affairs. He bravely said he was in favor of a recent bylaw passed by city council preventing extension of private use of ravine lots. Alas, that means Dr. John won't be able to build a swimming pool to complement his summer house. His Rosedale garden parties just won't be the same as his neighbor's. What's a poor embattled university president to do these days?

Permanent injunction wanted

Lawyers for the Canada Metals Company asked the Ontario Supreme Court Friday for a permanent rather than temporary injunction against the CBC broadcast "Dying of Lead."

In what was swiftly becoming a landmark censorship case, the lead company accused the CBC of "scandalous irresponsibility."

There are now two legal actions going on: the contempt case against five reporters and executives of the CBC and The Globe and Mail as well as CLM chairman Gary Perly and the Canada Metals action demanding a permanent injunction.

Canada Metals is claiming a National Research Council study by 11 leading scientists concluded lead poisoning does not present a serious health hazard in Canada.

The injunction was served only moments before the program went on air so that segments were cut out. There has been a two week adjournment in the contempt case granted at the request of Perly, who is conducting his own defense.

The CBC has responded by asking the temporary injunction be dissolved to allow broadcast of the controversial documentary warning of dangers of lead poisoning in the case of contamination of Canada Metals Plant in east Toronto.

Holland he could document 41 inaccuracies in the segment of "As it Happens." He said lead poisoning is "non-existent" as a problem.

In a related development, the province's air management branch has released study showing lead contamination as high as 500 parts per million in soil next to Prestolite Batteries Ltd. at 1352 Dufferin St. in Toronto.

The report recommends blood samples be taken from residents of 90 area homes.

Done last November, the survey, added to those of an air strong case for possible health hazards in the area.

Meanwhile, Provincial Environment Minister James Auld informed the Toronto Board of Health the ministry cannot set new health standards until consensus is reached by medical experts on an acceptable lead levels.

He earlier said results of tests being conducted by the ministry would not be available for six months.

In November a temporary order closing down the plant was quashed after an appeal by Canada Metals.

Dr. David Parkinson, an expert from the Hospital for Sick Children, has called for action as soon as possible.

He told the Labor Council of Metro Toronto "a compromise about a health matter is not a compromise, it's murder."

The board, to which Parkinson was just appointed has now called for an inquiry into charges an saying Canada Metal distributed a pamphlet containing misleading material. The allegations were made by east end community worker Dallard Runge.

Runge charged results of an October test by the company have never been publicized. The company, says Runge, is trying to imply there is no health hazard for area residents.

Islanders want U of T support

Members of the Toronto Island community will be manning an information booth in Sidney Smith foyer this Tuesday to Thursday between 11 am and 2 pm to seek support from students and staff of the University in their campaign to preserve the Island houses.

The 250 homes on Ward's Island are slated for demolition after August of this year. Most residents have already received eviction notices as a result of a Metro Council decision December 11 to terminate leases.

The Toronto Island Residents Association maintains the 29 acres occupied by the Island community are not needed by Metro for park land, and are seeking support from city residents to back this contention. If the Islanders are unsuccessful in their battle, they will be forced to leave and no compensation will be paid for the homes

"The major cause of inflation is an increase in the money supply." This was the opinion of Chris Bicknell, a delegate at a Metro tory conference held Saturday in Toronto.

Apparently, this is the view of Metro area Tories since his amendments to that effect were passed in a policy session by a small majority.

Debate was on a resolution that would call on a Progressive Conservative federal government to solve inflation with a 90-day freeze on prices and incomes.

This would be followed by "measures worked out with different groups that end monopolistic tendencies on the part of big-business and labor unions and foster competition in a free market economy."

"We need to return to monetary discipline," said Bicknell. He referred to a world-wide move away from such discipline.

However, the Ruble is holding its own in Russia.

"Price controls don't work, monetary supply controls do," he argued, thus contradicting the main motion.

Bicknell said the supply of money in Canada had increased by at least 50% in the last year. He and MP Sinclair Stephens, the seconder of the amendment, have been doing much research on economic problems in Canada.

The chairman of the session was no doubt disturbed by the direction of the debate. He tried to rig the speakers list to isolate Bicknell and Stephens.

Speakers against the amendment insisted that price controls do work and thought up other reasons for inflation. Excessive transfer payments was one emphatic suggestion. Sales tax was another.

One daring speaker even wondered about the disparity between corporate and personal income tax levels in terms of both effective tax-rates and total government revenues.

"That's a good question" said the chairman and announced that others wanted to use the hall so everyone should hurry up.

Other resolutions passed were more in line with Tory policy. Excessive government spending should be "reduced." Or is that cut-back?

One motion that was passed and then tabled for further discussion was one that called for a drastic revision in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The resolution called for a drop to 45 per cent from 67 per cent in the weekly benefits, a 26 week qualifying period, and further reductions to account for total family income.

One delegate, a certain Mr. Shaver, applauded this motion. "People have a preference to leisure over work. This measure would reduce unemployment and give us a healthier economy."

Other sessions of the conference called for associate membership in the European Common Market. The fusion of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation into the Department of Urban Affairs, and a desire to see oil prices "uniform."

Too much money, say Metro Tories

Can Communism conquer the world? See Wednesday's Varsity for the answer, or write WJVA, Wheeling, West Virginia. Sinking the ship tonile were Igor KGB, NBob Bellson, Mike Edwards, Tommy Sims, Gilda Gran, Don Cruickshank, Marilyn Emerson, and Mike Cowger. Pretty thin, huh?

SAC must demand repeal of code

The Students' Administrative Council, the Graduate Students' Union and the Association of Part-time Students have agreed to further negotiations with the administration concerning the proposed discipline code. This action is inconsistent with the SAC, the GSU, and the APUS position at the last Governing Council meeting.

At that time the students' representatives dismissed negotiations as fruitless; now they are back meeting in Simcoe Hall.

Student governor Howard Levitt told the Governing Council last month, "the only way students have been able to force change is through mass action." He's correct, and we think SAC should spend less time negotiating and more time talking to students. The tables set up at the two main libraries in recent weeks are an improvement over SAC's former efforts, but more must be done if the student councilors want to gain student support.

In a series of editorials throughout the fall and especially last month we have indicated why we don't want to see any discipline code imposed upon the students at this university.

We do not want to see any further repression come down upon our heads. As the Report of the (United States) President's Commission on Campus Unrest (1970) states: "History offers grim proof that repression once started is almost impossible to contain."

For this reason we reject a non-academic code of any sort. The criminal code of Canada is sufficient, and, unlike the proposed non-academic discipline code, it has a series of precedents built up over time which would enable relatively more just decisions.

We are also opposed to an academic code of any sort for the following reasons. First this part of the code (as well as the non-academic sections) does not seek the students' consent before it is implemented. Therefore it cannot become campus law.

Second the academic sections of the code seek to protect the university as it presently exists. We do not think the university is a sufficiently valuable learning institution. It might become such an institution if students were given equal decision-making power with the faculty on all decision-making bodies at all levels. It might be valuable if there were such academic protection safeguards as operational agreement between a professor and his students in any classroom.

The administration is presently trying to legislate academic penalties without getting at the root causes of the so-called academic infringements. We think the sections against plagiarism, essay banks, etc. would be perfectly acceptable to the vast majority of students provided these same students were made equal partners with faculty.

The way to achieve this result is, as we mentioned above, parity on all decision-making structures in this university. If that were the case students would have some input and would presumably take a hand in shaping their educational environment and goals. At the present time students have little influence by virtue of the lack of representation on decision-making bodies.

These changes are unlikely to come about without a strong and united student body and some firm leadership from its elected representatives.

We strongly disagree with the revised SAC position (see editorial this page). The SAC has received over 2,500 signatures calling for rejection of the discipline code.

SAC must follow the sign the students have given it and push for rejection of the Conway-Cadario Code. We didn't need a code in 1969 and we don't need or want one now.

The SAC is abrogating its position of responsibility by attempting to 'negotiate' with the administration over the code. We feel that more than 2,500 students who so far have signed a petition against the code will not follow any negotiations that the SAC now attempts.

We sincerely hope and believe that students will not see the new SAC negotiations as legitimate. They simply aren't.

SAC has been called upon to reject the code. It's duty is to do just that.

Bob Stanfield: He came, he saw, he put people to sleep.

SAC's position unprincipled, pragmatic

The Students' Administrative Council is inconsistent and contradictory concerning its discipline policy. We feel its intent is to have much of the present academic code passed at Governing Council in March.

However, we don't see how it presumes this is the correct position to take.

SAC first contradicts itself with respect to the 'Structures and Procedures' which will be used to implement pertinent sections of the discipline code.

The 'Structures and Procedures' call for the application of the Haist rules in instances of gross academic violations by professors, while students are bound by an administration-biased tribunal system. One set of rules applies to students and another to faculty.

SAC has already asked for staff/student parity on decision-making bodies included under the Haist Rules in a referendum last October. Those students that turned out to vote soundly backed the SAC. Now SAC is downplaying the Haist rules' emphasis on the academic code, relying on future struggle to reach the parity goal. In the meantime SAC seems content to accept some of the academic sections of the proposed code.

SAC has also backpeddled on its position on the necessity of operational agreement in the classroom. The SAC position on discipline which appeared unedited in the Varsity November 12, 1973, asked for "the implementation, on an interim basis, of a structure which will ensure the protection of fundamental rights in cases of academic offences." The academic rights for such an interim agreement consisted of: "cheating on examinations, plagiarism (by students or faculty), discrimination by faculty in evaluating students, and refusal by faculty to negotiate operational agreement in the classroom. Furthermore," we demand that all faculty be subject to this interim structure."

SAC's latest position places "operational agreement in the classroom", now referred to vaguely as "classroom procedure", as a long run goal, not part of an interim disciplinary structure. We maintain this is a fundamental revision of the SAC position and one that we feel most students will not, indeed cannot, accept.

Instead of rejecting the Code of Behaviour outright, as SAC's supporters have called on it to do through a petition campaign and mail-in cards, SAC has taken the decision-making out of students' hands and into its own, feeling "its position is the only correct one".

Its new position according those that bothered to reply—is not the correct one. In fact, SAC doesn't have a consistent position.

Another SAC contradiction is found in the entire negotiations-petition-signing campaign. In a policy paper describing the ideal university, SAC tells us negotiations with the administration aimed at producing an alternate discipline procedure will continue. However, SAC also asks us to continue signing petitions calling for unconditional rejection of the discipline code.

First conditions, and then no conditions. Either it is one or the other. A policy that attempts to mask a political difference with disconnected and confusing rhetoric is no policy at all.

We have been consistent in calling for rejection of the Conway-Cadario Code, for very specific reasons (see editorial this page). SAC has also called for rejection of the code; however, its latest position does not mention "rejection" or "repeal" even once.

We would like the SAC to answer our criticism and those of other students publicly. This Thursday's public and open SAC meeting might be a good time.

To leave matters at their present standstill invites student apathy on a very important question. If students are ever going to effect basic changes at this university they themselves must be involved. The SAC must recognize this reality.

The discipline code cannot be passed or implemented without SAC's approval. The administration may be prepared to pass the Code of Behaviour regardless of student opinion, but the Code will never be recognized by the students.

Bob Bettson: new media idol

I can scarcely tell you how pleased I was to read the long-awaited Credo of Robert Bettson in last Monday's Varsity. When I last spoke to Bob he informed me that he had all but made up his mind to submit his Credo for publication in either Viva magazine or the Bargain Hunters Press, the former having the advantage of increasing the potential for bidding on the U.S. movie rights, and the latter, of course, being published right here in Canada. Needless to say, I'm pleased he was able to strike a happy medium.

Critics of Bob (and let's not kid ourselves, when you cast off the yokes of pretended impartiality, there are always those who take exception) will no doubt complain that his Credo lacks the elan of those presented by similar Men of Programmes, such as Tom Paine, Bill Dowling, and Mister IGA. In answer to such negative natterings, I use Bob's own strikingly succinct rebuttal: "Well too bad."

Thinking people will immediately recognize that in Bob Bettson the reading public has found a media idol calculated to make us forget Mary Walpole, George Gamester, and even Clip Smith—such is the promise of his Credo.

I trust that Bob's candidacy for the editorship of the 1974-75 Varsity will not be marred by the interference of those parties who would keep such a qualified, concerned, interpreter of public events from his rightful station. The Varsity under Bettson's stern command would call to mind the hallowed Varsities of another era as edited by the likes of Bob Gauthier, Alex Podnick, Tom Walkom, David Frank, and Brian "Mr. Varsity" Johnson.

It is evident that Bob Bettson represents—in the terse, potent term he so deftly uses—the best journalistic investment one could hope to make with the sum of $3,150.00 or less.

McClelland gets lots of subsidies, says publisher

It's important, I think, to comment on some of the things that the incredible Jack McClelland said at Hart House as reported in Katherine Rowcliffe's story in the Varsity.

First, it is entirely possible that McClelland's statements were, in part, slanderous (and, in fact, that the Varsity itself may be open to a libel suit, though that's not a possibility I intend to pursue).

McClelland is quoted as saying that the initial organizers of the Independent Publishers Association were "a small group of militant idiots". Since I was the first and founding president of the IPA, I think it is fair to conclude that the remarkable McClelland is calling me an idiot. Since truth is the only sure defence in a libel suit, it might be interesting to have Jack try to prove in open court that I am, in fact, an idiot.

He would, I am certain, have difficulty doing so in the context of the founding of the IPA. The Independent Publishers Association was organized at a time when two of Canada's senior textbook publishers (Ryerson Press and Gage Textbooks) had been just sold to the Americans, when the remaining Canadian-owned book publishing houses could measure their independent future in weeks and when McClelland himself had hired a hall to tell the world he was faced with either going bankrupt or selling out to the Americans.

The existing publishers' trade organization, the so-called Canadian Book Publishers Council, because it was (and is) dominated by the branch-plants of American (and to a lesser extent English) publishers, was unwilling to take any stand whatsoever on the imminent demise of Canadian publishing.

It was in that context, therefore, that virtually all of the surviving Canadian book publishers banded together to create the Independent Publishers Association. McClelland and Stewart was the only major firm that remained aloof. (The "militant idiots" who founded the IPA included, among many others, the University of Toronto Press; I wonder if Marsh Jeanneret is talking to his lawyer today?)

McClelland, according to your story, went on to criticize the subsidies given to Canadian publishing firms which, he apparently said,

"distort their sense of the market and create artificial competition".

This is arrant nonsense. In our own case—and this is true of other Canadian publishers as well—subsidies simply enable us to produce more books and promote and market them more effectively. The only "distortions" produced in the marketplace by subsidies are found in the fact that Canadian books from Canadian publishers have begun to recapture the Canadian market from the Americans.

I think Varsity readers might be interested in knowing that McClelland and Stewart, in spite of Jack's public pronouncements, does in fact take virtually every "subsidy" dollar it can get its hands on:

- M&S received an emergency, interest-free loan of almost a million bucks from the provincial government (before any other publisher got anything). Recently, M&S has tried to have the amount of the loan more-or-less doubled.

- M&S is accepting this year a "block grant" of $12,200 from the Ontario Arts Council.

- M&S is accepting in excess of $30,000 this year as its "block grant" from the Canada Council.

- M&S is participating in the federal government's Book Purchase Programme and is happily selling $23,110 worth of books to the government under this ingenious subsidy programme.

There is, in fact, only one aid programme that M&S has, so far refused to participate in. And that, curiously, is the Ontario Arts Council's program whereby publishers are allowed to offer no-strings-attached grants to writers. This is a program whereby publishers receive no financial benefits whatsoever, but writers can get survival money on the publishers' recommendations.

Jack McClelland has repeatedly told us that his concern is with the writers. It is passing strange, therefore, that in practice he takes every government dollar that's offered but refuses to participate in the one program that provides money directly to writers.

But then a lot of Jack McClelland's behavior is passing strange these days.

I have the greatest admiration for Jack McClelland. I think he is one of the great book publishers of the western world.

But it's difficult to know whether statements like the ones he was making last week are motivated by malice or by ignorance. I would prefer to believe ignorance.

Jack, after all, is in a rather different category than many of the rest of us who are trying to publish books in this country.

He inherited his publishing company from his Daddy. Most of the rest of us have had to start from scratch. It does make a difference in your attitudes.

Varsity thanked for negative book review

Many thanks for Elaine Kahn's review of our Canadian Pocket Book, the Happy Hairdresser. The illustrations were great and Elaine's opinion of the book as "175 pages of crap" suggests we may have a best seller on our hands.

Hairdresser has had a first printing of 335,000 copies, which may be the largest-ever first printing of a Canadian book. Since December some 250,000 copies have been sold, here and the US.

Since getting into this side of the publishing business I've noticed most reviewers come down hard on books for the masses. In theory at least, entertainments by Jacqueline Susann, Arthur Hailey and our own Nicholas Loupous help subsidize better writers who appeal to a small percentage of readers.

And marketplace publishing has advantages over some other systems. The Happy Hairdresser would not get published in the USSR, but neither does Solzhenitsyn.

A couple of specific points in your review:

Yes, Elaine, Nicholas Loupous is a Canadian. He runs the Venus Beauty Salon in London, Ontario.

Your review refers to the John Steinbeck quote at the beginning of the book as an "epigram". I think the correct word is "epigraph."

Elaine says in her review that she was once a nice Jewish girl from Oshawa. Girls like her, like Nick's Greek girls, were harder for a lot of inoleum.

Does she mean she's been straightened out?

Anyway, keep those reviews rolling.

Hoch: sport reduced to consumer-producer status

Sport is fast becoming 'big business' in Canada. The past 30 years have seen a tremendous mushrooming of the spectator sports industry in Canada, and in Toronto especially. This past year Toronto was given a second "national" hockey team; this fall the Toronto entry in the World Football League will swing into action.

Canada, in fact, lags behind the United States in its emphasis on "big time" spectator sport, but the sports industry and the relatively few who own it in Canada stand to make a great deal of money through expansion. No longer is sport a game designed to be played for enjoyment; now we are conditioned to watch it—an inactive pastime.

One University of Toronto coach said last year that we are "probably only 25 years behind the United States" in its emphasis on big time sport. However, we seem to be closing the gap rather quickly.

The following feature is reprinted from the book Rip Off the Big Game by Paul Hoch. Hoch, a former post-doctoral fellow in physics at U of T, analyzes the politics of big time sport in his recent book published by Doubleday Anchor. Much of the article centres around sports in the United States, but Hoch makes use of some Canadian examples to indicate that Canada is not that far behind. Big time sport in this country is less developed, more subtle in some cases, and owned by fewer people, but it is still quite widespread. The relationships that Hoch sees between producers and consumers in US sport can also be found in Canadian sport.

By PAUL HOCH

In evaluating the successes and failures of the so-called "jock liberation movement," we have to keep in mind just what these players are up against. Not just in terms of authoritarian athletic institutions, but in terms of the relative isolation, narrowed world view, and distorted self-identities imposed on the athletes themselves. Not just by one coach. But usually by their whole athletic upbringing.

From the first time our aspiring athlete made it to his first schoolboy or little league team, he had to keep his hair "neatly trimmed," possibly even in an army crew-cut. Already he was being set aside, made to look different from other kids. More than likely all of his friends would tend to be fellow athletes or athletic boosters. If he was good at the game, his girl friend may even have been a cheerleader.

By the time he was in university he may have been living in a separate athletic dormitory, eating his meals separately, certainly taking separate (and almost always, inferior) courses from the other students, possibly even going to separate parties or hanging about with a separate jock-set (most United States campuses now have "jock" fraternities).

In short, by the time he makes it to the first team of the university varsity, he is likely to be totally locked into the narrow circle of the jock world and the jock mentality, for which he was preselected. (An innovation in the selection process of late is the use of psychological testing to help choose those potential athletes who show most evidence of hypercompetitiveness, aggressiveness, and the need to fight, fight, fight to win, win).

Intellectually, the varsity or professional athlete is likely to have been held back - more or less deliberately retarded - so as to be more fully exploited as an athletic commodity. At the big-time universities, practice sessions are apt to be so long and so frequent the athletes literally don't have time for their courses. Lacking any intellectual background - even that which comes from having broad student friendships and involvements - the varsity or pro athlete literally cannot imagine doing anything that would bring him the same social rewards and prestige as sports, the temporary as that prestige may be. His whole self-identity is athletics.

Even so, many have rebelled. But it is difficult. And those that do rebel are usually so appalled by what they see that they seldom wait around for an authoritarian coach to boot them off the team. They just quit. The odd pro footballer who does this - in George Sauer's case throwing up a $45,000-a-year contract - gets big publicity. But thousands of high school and university athletes have done the same.

'Fit into the system or get out'

This is certainly one of the main tragedies of today's militarized, commercialized sports: They have been so brutalized by the society around them that an athlete who really enjoys sports and wants to be something more than a jock-machine finds that there is literally no place for him. Unless, of course, he gets together with other athletes to change things.

There are those, of course, apparently content to be athletic robots. Or at least too weak to try to be anything more satisfying. The big jocks - brutalized by their coaches, exploited by their teams, put through their paces like toy soldiers - have been permitted to "make it" to the top of a mythical dreamworld in which they can play Superman.

Back in the real world, most take orders like good little tots. They have to. The labor market structure of their industry absolutely requires it (unless the players organize). No doubt all capitalists would like workers who are absolutely obedient, absolutely loyal to the company team, constantly striving to stay in shape, put out, improve their productivity, beat last year's figures, and so on. But all capitalists are not in the enviable position of professional sports owners (or even college coaches) of having perhaps as many as two score candidates for every job (though in practice they wouldn't bother to "draft" that many). Candidates who have no place else to go if the boss says their attitude is bad.

So the labor market is structured in that elitist pyramid fashion that keeps the kids hustling harder and harder for a smaller and smaller number of places all the way up the pyramid to the pros at the top. This structure puts the sports owners and their managers in a stronger position to dictate the values of their subordinates than capitalists in virtually any other industry, provided, of course, the athletes remain unorganized.

The only thing comparable is the pyramidal structure that screens out top management in the large corporations. There, too, the victims are totally unorganized. And there too - as Vance Packard shows in The Pyramid Climbers - the level of brutality and emphasis on having absolutely correct bourgeois attitudes is simply incredible. Because of this bottom-heavy labor market - with a mammoth reserve army of labor always in the wings - elitist sports serves as an ideological generator for the most neanderthal values of hypercompetitive, authoritarian, jungle capitalism.

Competition for status goals

But why do boys subject themselves to the brutality of competing, in order to "make it" in elitist sports? Bernie Parrish concludes his excellent inquiry into pro football They Call It a Game (P 293) with the remark that players "feel part of something big and important, and that outweighs logic.... They're swept up in its exaggerated importance - TV makes it glamorous.... Every action and reaction is subject to detailed analysis by the news media. Public awareness of the sport is acute.... The aura is intoxicating; for players, it is absolutely stupefying. They will endure practically anything to be part of the team."

Nor is this an accident. Precisely because elitist sports are such a good ideological generator for the most authoritarian and competition-minded values of authoritarian capitalism, it has received constant backing and pushing over the years from the military, big business, and organized religion.

From the viewpoint of the owners, the small elite of top jocks does yeoman service. Not only do they help socialize the working class to the elitism that is so essential in keeping them divided one from the other, but they are also the perfect pseudo elite: for workers to identify with - a beefsteak pseudo elite of brawn not brain, myth without power, and one completely under the thumb of the real bosses. So we learn our phony elitism.

Is the competitiveness taught by the sports establishment any less phony? The competitiveness is supposed to be directed only at the other workers, not at the management. The origin of all the competitiveness for starting places on varsity and pro teams is that same elitist split between players and fans. It is not necessary.

The money now spent on varsity teams and intercollegiate sports, for example, could be spent on intramural sports aimed at making everyone a player. If everyone was out playing they would have much less time to be fans. And if they had fulfilling, creative jobs, they wouldn't need to look for the pseudo satisfactions of being fans.

The competitiveness between opposing teams is also part of a pseudo world. What difference does it really make who wins sports? Jake Gaudaur, Canadian Football League remarked, "It matters not who wins, just as long as the advance which it's going to be November 28, 1970." He added "and just as long as important."

Capitalism, sport, and pro

The question has been asked by my close friend Bob

One can say that the producers (players) is really competition between teams but rather produce a product (comm) capitalist enterprises. However, elsewhere, the product itself is competition." Evidence that or unconsciously come to know that there is a strong tendency, i.e., produce the "appearance" while at the same time a (Leonard Spector gives scores in his book "The Jocks" that petition) is, after all, only social function is served as consumers (fans) believe there is obvious in wrestling matches particularly ignorant people appearance. The reality of it is hidden to them. Similarly in here almost all the bettors are ed, and try to figure out the

"Perhaps the best proof of competition is more important there is real competition was world championship of boxing fight at all, only the coming ghosts. Yet millions actually of the Marciano-Al competition in their seats cheering."

Winning is the only thing th

The "winning of the spectacle in fact the least important process, for it is the spectrally significant. Here we see the exact opposite of the men's consciousness is expressed that winning is the only thing obviously this winning is only extremely narrow confines "game," which in these contexts the rules of a game (an illusion) there must be both a winner for the spectacle-of-competition meaning. So that in social life just as essential to the spectacle.

This becomes much clearer spectacle of competition that those who own and sell the employ the workers (players). What they want to see is a "game" or losses is almost irrelevant, depend on the appearance of not on who wins the game. This man owns both teams (Jamaica owned three teams in the League.)

But it is just as true when owners who run one league everyone knows that the winners benefit from the appearance at his arena where he collects the event that one team is to provide a marketable commodity with another team in the teams' owners will try to steal team, which is a loser for all of profits.

The strengthening of losses the spectacle-of-competition profits, is institutionalized in whereby the weakest teams weakness on the field is also reflected at the box office choice of the new players. Canadian Football League, owners actually have a game whereby those "losers" who are paid receipts from the "game."

A struggle between producers

"The real competition, appearance is (1) the co-producers to make the same competition between owners (although even here there is that although owners in opposition for rookies, they usually veterans). In the latter case which capitalism inevitably markets.

There are only so many (spectacles-of-competition) market of consumers (and result in owners of these products sell their products since not a pose of them. Thus, when the NFL owners opposed to it saw it as a threat to their profits.

 profits, though they tried to disguise their real interest by alluding to the quality of football, etc. The AFL, being new in the market, had to break the "brand loyalty" of the NFL consumers and therefore sold their tickets (product) at a lower price. Of course they also tried to tap new customers by going to different cities if possible. But tv makes the market almost nationwide so competition was inevitable.

 "Of course once their product caught on they raised their prices, and the consumers who benefited from this short (untypical in the stage of monopoly capitalism) bout of competition were once again facing monopoly rip-off prices. This brief bit of competition also helped the producers (i.e. players). While it lasted the AFL capitalists were forced to pay higher salaries in order to sign rookies to produce the same quality spectacle-of-competition and prevent them from going to the NFL. So there was a price war for a short period in which some producers and consumers were the beneficiaries.
 "If the NFL had had the power to keep the AFL out of business, and thereby protect their right to exploit the market as a monopolist, they would have done so. But the AFL was able to make it a battle. Therefore, like all good capitalists, the owners of both leagues realized that their competition was only benefiting the consumers and the producers, and unlike the spectacles they sell, they decided they would both be winners.

 Thus, in contrast to the ideology they perpetrate, in true monopolist fashion they decided to merge. This way they could agree to share the market, raise their prices together and ensure the continued rip-off of the consumers (fans). They could also stop the situation which put the producers (players) in a stronger bargaining position. When the two leagues were competing the players could in theory play one off against the other and get slightly better salaries. But once the leagues merged the players were again faced with only one possible employer, since they would now all be subject to the same draft and same monopoly.

"It is important to see that in their behavior as capitalists in the monopoly stage of capitalism, these owners avoid competition with each other at all costs while, at the same time, they sell a product whose main ideological function is to perpetrate the belief in competition."
 It might be added that whenever the players suggest that the reserve or option clauses that bind them to indentured servitude for one owner be discarded, the owners bashfully retreat behind the veil of their pretended competition and claim that this would mean that the richest team would sign all the best players. At the stage of monopoly capitalism, this is simply nonsense. If there was any danger of this happening, the owners would simply collude to stop it. They could, for example, pass a statute preventing any given team from signing more than a certain number of players from other teams each year. Because General Motors is richer than Chrysler does not mean that they sign all the best engineers. They are all in the game together.

DISCIPLINE: THE SAC POSITION

AT ITS LAST MEETING, THE U OF T GOVERNING COUNCIL DEFEATED A PROPOSAL REQUIRING CONSENSUS SUPPORT WITHIN THE UNIVERSITY BEFORE DISCIPLINARY PROCEDURES CAN BE IMPLEMENTED.

THE COUNCIL IS PREPARED TO IMPOSE THE CODE OF BEHAVIOUR ON STUDENTS DESPITE THEIR CLEAR OPPOSITION.

THUS, SOME PEOPLE HAVE URGED THE STUDENTS' ADMINISTRATIVE COUNCIL TO STOP NEGOTIATING WITH U OF T OFFICIALS.

SAC HAS DECIDED NOT TO FOREGO ANY OPPORTUNITY TO IMPRESS ON THE GOVERNING COUNCIL THE WEIGHT OF STUDENT OPINION AGAINST THE CODE. NEGOTIATIONS WILL CONTINUE.

IN THE LONG RUN:

- * All-encompassing disciplinary procedures as contained in the Code of Behaviour can only be developed when students have direct and significant input at all levels of university decision-making.
- * Many disciplinary problems result from student-professor classroom disputes:
 - Students must have a significant voice on bodies which hire, promote, tenure and fire professors
 - Students must have an equal role with their professors in determining course content, methods of evaluation, and classroom procedure.
- * So-called disruptive demonstrations, such as those which helped win undergraduate access to the Robarts stacks, must be dealt with by negotiations over causes, not by punitive discipline procedures.
- * Any other basis for discipline asks students to help enforce existing inequities, and makes change more difficult.

IN THE SHORT RUN:

- * Students accused of academic offences — cheating, plagiarism etc. — must have greater protection than is currently offered by the arbitrary procedures of the Caput, an illegitimate body which contains no students.
- * For these academic offences only, a tribunal should be established, consisting of three students and two faculty members.
- * Maximum penalty for academic offences should be a zero mark on the work involved. For abuse of the library or computer centre, maximum penalty should be denial of privileges and restitution, if applicable. (The Code of Behaviour imposes maximum penalties of expulsion from the university for all academic offences)
- * Penalties must be assessed by the tribunal, not by its chairperson (as stipulated in the code) Any hired prosecutor must be acceptable to both students and faculty (not only to the Governing Council as in the code)
- * Students must have the right to be informed of the marking scheme at the beginning of their courses. They must have the right to approve any changes proposed after the last date for course changes.

IN NEGOTIATIONS SAC WILL CONTINUE TO ARGUE THAT ANY DISCIPLINE SYSTEM MUST HAVE BOTH STUDENT AND FACULTY APPROVAL.

STUDENTS ARE URGED TO SIGN THE PETITION AGAINST THE CODE OF BEHAVIOUR

Lady Blues tie McMaster 5-5

By SANDY BENNETT

The women's ice hockey team remained undefeated for the season but did not play impressively in gaining a 5-5 tie against McMaster at the Dundas Arena.

Because of a snow storm, the Blues were late arriving in Hamilton and the game started over half an hour late. This did not seem to affect the team as Lynda Harley opened the scoring at 1:37 of the first period. From there on, however, the Blues took a nose dive. Skating as if they had lead in their legs, the Blues did not chase the puck into the corners and thus failed to capitalize on McMaster's many passing errors.

Mac employed a defensive style of hockey but still managed several two on one breaks throughout the first period, resulting in two goals by Marian Convey and Lois Cole.

The Blues did not get untracked until about the five minute mark of the second period when they mounted a sustained drive around the Mac goal. However, McMaster made it 3-1 at 6:55 on another goal by Marian Convey.

At 7:44 the puck slipped past the Mac defence at the blue line. It was chased down by Blue's Margi Goldsmith who beat a sprawling Mac player and faked the goalie completely, putting the puck into the empty net.

Mac scored at 10:47 and the second period ended 4-2 for McMaster.

The third period featured seven penalties, most for body checking which is not allowed. Actually, few real checks were thrown but tapping shoulders near the boards seemed enough to send a player off. It is fortunate that Queen's are filming all their home games so a definition of this rule can be given at the next referees' clinic.

In the third period, however, Blues scored three straight goals. Val Bush, banged in a rebound; Jackie Reeves scored from the blue line, and Lynda Harley put the Blues ahead at 11:47. Toronto goalie Judy Reeves was given an assist on this goal even though it resulted off a faceoff in the Mac end!

Mac tied the score at 13:08 when Judy Reeves lost sight of the puck which had gone over the net and then rebounded back.

With three seconds left it appeared that Blue's Margi Goldsmith suffered a serious shoulder injury when she fell into the boards. Reports are, however, that she was not as badly injured as first thought and may play in the next game on Tuesday night against York at Varsity.

Toronto divers do well

By ALEX LAU

Last Saturday, the Benson Building hosted the first invitational diving meet ever held on the U of T campus.

Skip Phoenix from the Etobicoke Diving Club, coached by John Dickinson (who is also the current coach of the U of T men's and women's diving teams) easily won the one-meter and three-meter men's open. Barbara Cappa from the Western Ontario Diving Club won both of the women's open events.

For the divers that participated, it was a profitable experience. For the meet officials, however, it was a long and weary day as the meet started at 8 am and ended at 11 pm.

The competition included divers from Pointe Claire, Halifax, various Ontario universities and the Perkins Swim Club from Rochester, New York.

U of T divers competed in four of the eight events—the open one-meter and three-meter competitions for men and women.

Sandy Henry of U of T did well in the women's one-meter, finishing fifth, while Anne Milburn and Ruth Allen finished sixth and seventh.

Alex Lau and Tim Bean of the men's team did their best ever in both men's open events, but strong competition limited their placing. Bean finished tenth on the one-meter, and Lau placed seventh on the three-meter.

Waterloo's Lester Newby, one of the prime contenders for the CIAU team, finished second on one-meter and fifth on three-meter.

Next weekend, the women will proceed to Ottawa for the OWIAA championships and the men will battle divers from other Ontario universities at Waterloo February 22 and 23.

Swim Blues defeat Guelph

By PAUL CARSON

The men's swimming team sank the hapless Guelph Gryphons 62-29 in a depressing dual meet Saturday that failed to solve either the continuing problems of OUAAs men's swimming or the question of just who will be selected to the Varsity team for the OUAAs championships later this month.

The actual score is somewhat of a joke since most of Blues better swimmers were left at home and the eligibility rules were liberally juggled in order to inflate Guelph's final score.

Blues could have finished first and second in every event but apart from embarrassing their hosts, little else would have been proved by flaunting Guelph's obvious lack of talent.

Only six officials were on hand for the meet and the farce attracted a total of seven spectators, of whom three came from Toronto. It was, to put things mildly, a depressing setting for intercollegiate competition.

However, for some Varsity swim hopefuls, it was a veritable Howard Cosellian struggle for survival as no less than eight swimmers are still battling for the final two places on the 16-man aggregation that goes to the OUAAs finals in Waterloo February 22-23.

Freshman freestyler Mike Hibberd made the greatest improvement as he jumped from seventeenth to eleventh place on the Varsity rankings after recording personal bests of 1:56.7 in the 200-yard freestyle and 5:20.2 in the 500 free.

Rob Goldberg helped his cause by winning the 50 free, Lance Aho kept pace with a first place in the 200-yard breaststroke and Scott Day remains in contention after winning the 100 free.

Sophomore Dave Schappert, a consolation finalist in three events at the 1973 CIAU finals, is not yet assured of a spot on the OUAAs team. Others involved in the friendly but serious competition for coveted team positions are Randy Bissett, Neil Jones and Dave McKinstry.

Two of the three divers, Finn Temple, Alex Lau and Tim Bean, will be selected to complete the 18-man final roster.

Backstroke veteran Russ Farquhar still hasn't recorded a decent time in his speciality but a 51.5 in the 100 free should give him a place in the 400-yard freestyle relay.

The final selections won't be made until after a series of time trials and races among the eight or nine swimmers involved. These events, tentatively set for Tuesday and Thursday in the Hart House pool, should be among the most spirited paces of the year.

As for the state of OUAAs swimming in general, the situation may be helped by a rule change allowing up to eight entries per school in most events at the OUAAs championships. This should permit the weaker teams to gain some points in the sprints where they have depth if not overly much talent.

Varsity coach Robin Campbell also suggests that the CIAU find some way to admit Simon Fraser despite its policy of open athletic scholarships.

"They would probably win in a breeze, but at least the quality of swimming would improve."

Meanwhile college swimming will plod along with hopelessly weak schools like Guelph forcing rigged scores and attracting all of seven spectators.

Curling team wins

In the men's intercollegiate curling championships held over the weekend in Brock, Toronto defeated Western 8-4 in the final game to win the championship.

Toronto defeated Laurier 11-5 in the first game and then drew a bye. Next they downed Guelph 11-5 and lost to Queen's 8-7.

Toronto then defeated Western 10-7 in a game they had to win to get into the championships. This set the stage for their final win over the same team for the championship.

Toronto team members were skip Craig Harris, vice Randy Neal, second Paul Friedman and lead Don Dowdy.

Sir George is no match for Blues

By PAUL CARSON

Bernie Wolfe plays a mean game of goal for the Sir George Williams hockey team; however, all his assortment of gymnastic abilities weren't sufficient to prevent a 5-3 victory for the Blues Friday night in an exhibition game at the Arena before about 1,800 spectators.

Wolfe stopped 57 of the 62 Varsity shots fired by him during the interesting but occasionally dull game. Interesting because Wolfe displayed a brilliant catching hand and nimble reflexes; dull because his Georgian teammates could manage only 16 shots on Jim Campbell in the Varsity net and consequently most of the play resembled a weary Horatio defending the bridge.

The Georgians managed to skate with the Blues for most of the game but Varsity's passing and general positional play were noticeably superior.

Blues also came up with a solid defensive effort for the initial forty minutes but lapsed somewhat in the final period as the Georgians scored twice within 32 seconds to make matters interesting.

Based on Friday's performance Georgians are a vastly improved team from the hapless collection of individuals that Blues hammered 9-0 in Montreal in December. Wolfe has learned to compensate for his well-known weakness on shots to his stick side overshifting to that side and virtually daring opposition forwards to score on his good glovehand side.

Blues tried to exploit the opportunities presented by a somewhat weak SGW defence but a combination of Wolfe and inaccurate shooting kept the game from becoming a rout.

Ironically, in spite of Wolfe's outstanding play, the eventual winning goal was a pure fluke that deflected off two Georgian defenders before sailing past the goaltender on, guess what, his stick side.

Blues were leading 3-1 in the final period when Campbell made one of his rare stops and passed the puck ahead to defenceman Al Milne. He carried it to the Georgians' blue line before lofting a harmless-looking shot that somehow ended up behind a very surprised Wolfe.

Two minutes later the goal was very important as Georgians had scored on a power play and then Don Atkinson stole the puck in the Blues' end to beat Campbell on a sudden breakaway.

Kent Ruhnke allowed everyone to breathe a little easier when he beat Wolfe at 13:36 with a perfect shot to the stickside after a clever series of moves around the Georgians' defence.

Blues' Bill Fifield and Ron Harris (15) watch Fifield's backhand skid off goalie Bernie Wolfe's pad.

Blues dominated the opening period and amassed an incredible 24-4 edge in shots on goal. Rookie Ron Harris opened the scoring during a power play as he deflected Ivan McFarlane's deflection of a Brent Swanick shot into the net at 3:12. The SGW defence was nowhere to be seen when Don Pagnutti tipped the score to 2-0 at 8:47 as Wolfe failed to control rebounds from Ruhnke and Larry Hopkins.

Chuck Luksa rushed the length of the ice at 1:12 of the second period and suddenly it was 3-0 but Wolfe shut the door in spite of a 19-5 Varsity advantage in shots.

Marcel Lapierre fooled Campbell on a long shot at 6:41 for the first of his two goals and that's where matters remained until Milne's lucky floater that eventually won the game.

Georgians took nine of 14 minor penalties and each team scored one powerplay goal.

Blues put their first place standing and 37-game unbeaten string in league play on the line to-morrow night as they play second place York Yeomen in the inappropriately titled York Ice Palace, a large concrete refrigerator-like cage housing the most animalistic fans in the league.

B'ball Blues lose first place to Ottawa

By PETER CLARKE

The basketball Blues lost the season-long battle for first place to Ottawa Saturday night when the Gee-Gees defeated them 85-82 before a sellout crowd in the Montpetit Hall.

The night before, the Blues were hard-pressed in dropping Carleton 78-69 for a victory that gave them a momentary share of first place with Ottawa.

Ottawa now has the OUA eastern section lead with a record of 12-1. Toronto is back in second with a record of 12-2, both losses coming at the hands of the Gee-Gees.

Before the big game against Ottawa, Toronto coach John McManus said, "We hope to get this one. It'd make a good season for us."

Ottawa's Merv Sabey, however, had other ideas. He almost single-handedly demolished the Blues, scoring 33 points, most of those in the game, with 21 of those points coming in the first half.

"He's probably the best centre in Canada," McManus said later, "but we made him look better than he is."

In the first half Ottawa jumped to an early 18-4 lead. Ottawa played an aggressive man-to-man defence that stymied the Toronto players. Offensively they controlled the rebounds and got fine outside shooting from Sabey.

Toronto countered with a zone defence but their starters were nervous and seemed to lose their poise, which Ottawa capitalized on.

By half-time, Ottawa had rung up a 43-27 score over the Blues.

In the second half, Toronto still couldn't neutralize Sabey. Ottawa wrecked Toronto's half court press and grabbed 19 rebounds to keep the Blues off balance.

Ottawa continued their aggressive man-to-man defence. They kept up their good shooting and their full court press caused many Toronto turnovers, which allowed them to build up an almost insurmountable lead.

In the middle of the second half, Ottawa lead 70-44, with five minutes left it was 76-50, and with half a minute remaining it was 83-60.

The Blues just couldn't seem to get untracked. They were plagued by poor shooting as the tight Ottawa defence left them only the outside.

When they tried a man-to-man defence, it didn't work because the Gee-Gees were just too good. And, of course, no one was stopping Sabey.

It was a fast game with frequent substitution and one that obviously pleased the highly partisan hometown crowd. It was also a cleanly played game — no player on either team fouled out.

Conducting a post mortem after the game, McManus said, "We couldn't get untracked in the second half. If you give a club like Ottawa that many turnovers, you're bound to loose."

The Ottawa coach, Bob O'Billovich, said his team won mainly because of superior defence. "We've got the best defensive record in the country," he pointed out and commended Ottawa players Woodburn and Cronyn as having done fine defensive work during the game.

Toronto scorers were led by Brian Skivington (16 points), Glenn Scott (10), and Frank Cross (9). Sabey led the Gee-Gees with 33, followed by Cronyn (15) and Plaskacz (11).

In the Carleton game Friday night, Blues went man-to-man in the first half and finished with a 44-38 lead.

In the second half, Toronto employed a zone which slowed down the game. The Ravens, who have been struggling all year, couldn't overcome this tactic although they kept the game close.

Toronto lead the Ravens 52-41 with 13 minutes left and 65-50 with six minutes left. What really killed the Ravens, though, was their sluggishness towards the end of the game — they only managed 12 points in the last 14 minutes.

"It was a lousy game," said McManus, "but we scored more points than they did. We were good in spots."

Skivington lead the Toronto scorers with 29 points, most of them coming from under the basket as the Raven press faltered badly.

Scott got 15 points for Toronto and Cross added 13 more.

Carleton only shot 37 per cent from the floor.

Toronto is in second place now but to stay there they have to defeat third place Laurentian here this Saturday. The last time they played them, they won by only a point.

Badminton

The Toronto men's badminton team placed first in the OUA badminton tournament at Western last weekend. Other teams in the tournament were Western, McMaster, and Waterloo.

The team was spearheaded by Jun Ooi in the singles and the doubles pair of Lane Bishop and Ooi who captured first place finishes.

Other team members also did well. Robert Young placed third in the singles behind Bishop in second. Blair Faulkner came fourth in the singles, and teamed up with Geoff Mills to place second in the doubles.

Toronto had 13 points for first place while Western placed second with nine.

The season ends this weekend at Waterloo when Toronto meets the winner of the eastern section for the intercollegiate championships.

Women's sports results

Using a half court press and a lot of fast-breaking, Toronto lambasted York 86-21 in a women's intercollegiate basketball game.

The Toronto scorers were Sue Scott (25 points), Karen Edgar (12), Terry Knight (11), Chris Crawford and Martha Williams with 10 each, Daina Zukauskas (6), Anne Williams (5), Leslie McIntosh (4) and Trish Beck (2).

Queen's visits Toronto February

15 in the last game of the season before the playoffs.

In WAA interfaculty curling, Mary Bullen (skip of the Dents' rink) and Joan Hughes (skip of SMC II's) will play off for first place Wednesday, February 13.

The other teams in the final standings were: Pharm (third), Vic (fourth), followed by SMC II, NSG I, New NSG II, Erin and Vic II.

For those interested in trying out the game, five sheets of ice are available at the Terrace Club every Wednesday from 5:30 to 7:30 until the curling season ends in early April. Your athletic fees are paying for these sheets of ice, so if you're at all interested, come and make use of them.

The intercollegiate curling season winds up this weekend in Guelph with the OWIAA championships.

In women's volleyball, Eng downed New II 15-9, 12-15, 15-10. The Dents won their match with New II by default, as did Meds IV over Musie.

The II beat SMC in two games, 15-6 and 15-8. Meds did the same to Food Sciences with scores of 15-13 and 15-10. Erin and Trin went the full three games, 15-3, 7-15, 15-6. Erin taking in the match. PHE I defeated Pharm I 15-7, 15-11.

In women's interfac hockey, A Division, PHE clobbered Vic, 8-1. Scoring for the jocks were Marilyn Longs, Pam Dunbar, Pat Williams (2), Leslie Burley, and Carol McDougall. Diane Monroe was the Vic scorer.

In the B Division, Pharm lost its game to SMC, 3-0. Louise Shrubsole scored one goal with Joan Yanch scoring the other two.

Vic French lecturer fired, students demand voice

The firing of a lecturer in the Victoria College French department in January has sparked a student demand for representation on the body which, effectively, wields the power on such decisions.

A page may be turned in the college's history Friday as a general meeting of its French department votes on a student amendment to the department's constitution.

The amendment would sit three students, three faculty members, and the department chairman on the consultative committee to the chairman which, in practice, has the last word on hiring and firing of staff within the department.

The committee now consists of four faculty members and the chairman.

Peter Jarrett (Vic III), who introduced the amendment, said his move was precipitated by the department's recent refusal to renew the contract of a popular lecturer at Vic despite strong student objections.

The lecturer prefers to have his name withheld at present.

Jarrett explained all but two of the instructor's forty present students from four separate classes signed a tersely-stated petition in November "supporting his (the lecturer's) retention as a member of the Victoria French department."

The petition read, in part: "We protest any recommendation to release him from his position as being unrepresentative of student opinion."

"There is no doubt in our minds that he is a teacher of superior quality...."

"His departure would be a loss to his students — both present and prospective."

If the general meeting does decide Friday to allow students on the consultative committee, the head of the college could ask Vic's Board of Regents to reverse the decision, in accordance with Victoria's rules which are similar to the university's Haist rules. Victoria, as a federated college, is not bound by the Haist rules.

Jarrett is one of the eight students who, along with 28 faculty members, can vote at Friday's general meeting. He takes a course from the instructor in question.

Jarrett charged the consultative committee and the department had "overruled the student voice."

He said the committee "made a quick decision as soon as it found out students were going to do something."

"The reasons for the decision were never made public," he added.

Jarrett pointed out although the consultative committee only advises the chairman, "traditionally the chairman never uses his veto power."

Theoretically the committee advises the department chairman on all matters relating to appointments, teaching assignments and timetables.

Jarrett said before the committee had made its decision on this particular case, he asked department chairman David Smith to have the committee allow one or more of the instructor's students speak to the body.

Vic French department chairman David Smith, in this particular case, had declared a conflict of interest and did not take part in the deliberations.

"Not only did the committee not throughout this month.

He suggested the committee as a whole would appreciate being able to study the recommendations the committee had approved and the amendments it had made all at once.

It was "unfair," he said, to send the recommendations to Governing Council when not all of the committee members had seen them.

Professor William Dunphy, though, told Barnes, in effect, if the committee insisted on having all of its members present and informed neither it nor he would be in a position to get anything done.

The committee is discussing the recommendations of the report in the order in which they appear.

It has not discussed the report generally nor the principles of the report, nor the very important criteria for tenure.

Forster himself noted in the course of the meeting that the recommendations that were approved "are not to be interpreted as they stand."

A & S will adopt credit system

By MARINA STRAUSS

Full-time arts and science students are likely to go on a credit system next year.

Although not yet officially rubber-stamped by Governing Council or its academic affairs committee, assistant dean W.D. Foulds revealed Monday "as far as the (arts and science) faculty is concerned, we've decided in favor of the credit system."

The faculty is already charging ahead with ironing out the "administrative details" of a new credit system, setting up a revised fees schedule for the next academic year.

Referring to the proposed system as if implementation had already been scheduled for next year, Foulds explained full-time students' fees will be calculated "according to the course load."

The proposal for a credit system, recommended by last year's Berylne report reviewing the new program, has already been approved by the faculty council. It is now before the curriculum and standards sub-committee of academic affairs.

Under the present system, full-time students pay a standard fee, regardless of the number of courses they are enrolled in.

Furthermore, credit towards a degree is now granted for only five courses in each winter session, although some students take up to six courses.

The credit system would allow students to get credit for any extra courses taken during the academic year.

In fact, under the new system no official distinction would be made between full and part-time students since any student may take as many courses as he or she wishes.

However, if a student taking less than four courses were registering at U of T for the first time, he or she would have to enroll in the new Woodsworth College, which is specifically for extension students.

While noting he has not yet thought out the details, Foulds added: "We'll have to get it worked out pretty soon."

He estimated new fees information should be ready "within the next month."

Foulds pointed out the system would be "similar to the arrangements made for Scarborough College."

In September, Scarborough became the first U of T college to institute the system, and students have reacted favorably to it. The college is anticipating increased enrolment.

But Foulds admitted he was working on the assumption that Governing Council would approve the new system.

Academic affairs committee chairman John Dove said "If there is no hold up" in the curriculum and standards sub-committee, the proposal "will get approved fairly soon."

Dove presumed the recommendations would come before his committee "this or next month." He agreed plans would have to be spelled out before pre-registration in April.

want to listen to us, even in written form — it went ahead and made its decision," Jarrett asserted.

Smith refused to reveal the reasons for the instructor's dismissal.

"The president of Victoria University received visits from students and was willing to explain the case in general terms," Smith pointed out. "The president obviously would prefer not to have" an interview with The Varsity, Smith added.

Although the university's Haist rules "ban student members from any committee making decisions on the career of any faculty members," as Smith put it, students have found their way in to staffing decisions in some cases.

The sociology department and the Faculty of Architecture have both evaded the Haist rules by setting up student-staff parity bodies to merely advise the chairmen.

Tenure issues may not be fully discussed

By RANDY ROBERTSON

The critical issues of the Forster task force report on academic staffing, hiring and firing may not be adequately discussed because time limitations are forcing the academic affairs committee to fragment its discussion of the report.

Committee student member Gord Barnes said the committee left itself "very little incentive" to deal with these issues when it decided yesterday to send eleven of the 45 recommendations of the report it has amended and approved, to the Governing Council for approval later this month.

Barnes urged all the recommendations be sent all at once to the Governing Council as a complete package and not "piecemeal" as they are approved.

Committee chairman John Dove however said the committee probably will not be able to review all 45 recommendations before its terms of office ends in June.

The committee will as well be presented with a major piece of business—the hygiene report—to deal with before the month is out.

The committee will not be able to send a complete package even if it wanted to.

Dove stressed the present committee has an obligation to clear the recommendations it does approve.

It should not leave them as a burden for next year's committee, "which may be a quite different committee," and which may want to consider all the recommendations all over again from its own point of view.

The university administration hopes to make use of the report's recommendations on probationary hiring periods in the coming academic year.

Or that is "what is desirable," as U of T president John Evans said.

Barnes noted attendance at the committee had not been consistent throughout the meeting and not all committee members had been present at all committee meetings

It is "a question of consistency," he said, of the earlier sessions understood in the light of the later.

The criteria on tenure occur very late in the document.

The recommendations applying to probationary periods for lectures and assistant professors, the recommendations which Evans hopes to apply to staff hired for the coming academic year, were in fact discussed at yesterday's meeting.

Social Work students want reply to demands

By MARILYN EMERSON

At yesterday's student union meeting at the Faculty of Social Work, close to 100 students voted unanimously to support "alternative action" if faculty fails to reply in writing to student demands to change the program.

Basically what the students want is a more flexible program and representation on decision-making committees.

Faculty members were invited to attend the meeting but no representatives were present.

The student union negotiating committee had requested the faculty to submit a written reply to their demands by 1 pm Monday a prerequisite to negotiations.

In response to that request faculty appointed a committee of nine members (a group of teaching faculty) to meet with the student union negotiating committee.

The faculty committee is empowered to "negotiate the framework within which consideration may be given to the six points raised in the student union memorandum."

"The term 'framework' is meant to include such matters as the nature of the negotiations, time, place, frequency of meetings, the amount of freedom within the constitution of the university that each of the two parties of the negotiations will have to reach conclusions."

The group of teaching faculty (faculty committee) is required to report back to the full teaching faculty.

The student negotiating committee met with faculty committee Monday but were not satisfied with the situation because students say the faculty committee has no power "to do anything."

One student described the appointed nine-member faculty body as a committee of "lightweights."

General feeling at yesterday's student union meeting was that faculty tactics are again being used to evade the central issue of student demands.

Hence the student body moved they would issue no more "deadlines" to faculty. If a written response to student demands is not received by Monday, the student union will stop negotiations and proceed to vote Tuesday on "alternative action."

Students passed a motion that all negotiating meetings be public and unchaired and that the professional values course be first on the agenda for discussion.

Students are requesting that faculty submit in writing their position regarding the "values" course. They insist this report be in their hands by Tuesday for discussion at the student union meeting.

Dean Albert Rose was not available yesterday for comment on the situation. Assistant Dean W.A. Bourke said to accommodate students, faculty were not having weekly meetings. Normally the faculty meets bi-weekly.

Bourke expressed what he felt the faculty position to be as "what problems are students wanting to solve?"

But he said students have objected to this point of view and want faculty to deal only with student union immediate demands.

Bourke said the professional values course was originally introduced by the School of Social Work Student Association over three years ago.

When the course was assessed a year ago it was decided unanimously by faculty and students to continue the course.

As planned by students the "alternative values classes" began yesterday and were well attended.

Vic land to be developed but nobody knows how

Charles Streets.

Two weeks ago, Project Planning was supposed to have finished Phase One of the study after consulting with representatives of 18 groups around Vic and the Vic community. So far as anybody knows now, the firm only consulted with two, Victoria College Council and the alumni. Vic is paying Project Planning $8,500 for Phase One.

Once again, however, no one has seen the Phase One report, not even the Victoria Board of Regents Task Force on Development, the official Vic body charged with co-ordinating with Project Planning.

The task force has two board members, two Vic administrators, two faculty and two students.

Phase One was supposed to report on strategies. The original idea was to have started Phase Two, a $14,500 effort, start in February and produce a particular plan of development.

If the comments made to the alumni last week are any indication, phase two is underway, but what phase two will produce is a wide-open question.

Non-academic female staff status discussed

By KATHERINE ROWCLIFFE

The status of non-academic female staff is now under active consideration by a joint task force composed of members from both the business and internal affairs committees of the Governing Council.

Erindale professor Gary Thaler, chairman of the task force, conducted its first meeting Tuesday evening at Hart House. The discussion was general, as terms of reference were discussed.

Nutrition department technician Gwen Russell, a member of the committee, suggested they try to encourage opportunity and advancement for the non-academic female staff and make such an endeavour a co-operative effort with the personnel department.

U of T has, at present, an average turnover of 30-35 per cent of its staff. In the civil service 10 per cent is considered average.

To terminate one employee's fringe benefits, hire and train a new person and restart his/her fringe benefits costs an average of $500 to $600.

This high turnover of staff is, consequently, costing the university a great deal of money.

It is, however, difficult to gather information realising to injustices, as internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway and Gwen Russell discovered last spring when they sent a confidential questionnaire to the non-academic female employees of U of T.

Only 42 of approximately 3,700 possible replies were received. Many were apparently inhibited by fears of job security.

In dealing with individual cases, Conway and Russell discovered some major disparities and submitted a report to the business affairs committee on September 25.

The report cited specific problem areas including career development and job classification.

In the case of administrative assistants for example, there were, at the time of the report, 37 women and 12 men at the I Level but 24 men and 12 women at the II Level.

The report states: "It would appear that some sort of discriminating practice is at work here, as the Administrative Assistant I category would normally be considered to provide of a 'pool' of talent available for promotion to the next level within that series."

The present joint task force was established December 20 to investigate the situation.

Librarian Anne Woodsworth, a member of the committee expressed concern that their findings may not be considered seriously unless substantiated with extensive evidence.

Vice-provost Gary Wasserman, secretary for the committee said afterwards, the non-academic female staff would be asked for suggestions and problems in the near future.

The mechanism for such an inquiry has not been determined as yet.

He went on to express confidence the committee could achieve constructive results.

Study shows students have little say

The ratio of students to faculty on academic committees cross-campus averages about three to one.

In only one case, Innis College, do students come close to parity on a faculty council, with 12 students sitting to 13 staff.

In every case but Massey College and the School of Hygiene there are at least some student representatives.

In the first case, there is no faculty council, in the second there is a council but the student reps do not vote.

However, in many cases the student role is severely limited.

The Faculty Council for Architecture, for example, seats 33 staff to 4 students.

In Forestry, the ratio is 40:4, in Phys Ed 42:8. These figures are for 1972-3.

The School of Management Studies seats all members of the Faculty and two students to attend council meetings.

Additional students may be invited to attend on an ad hoc basis depending on the relevance of the agenda to students.

The information was released Monday by the subcommittee of academic affairs charged with deciding the issue of student representation on department tenure committees.

The information shows while students do have token representation on some faculty councils, not only are there no students on tenure committees, no one seems to know how many tenure committees exist at U of T.

A letter by Gary Wasserman, assistant to vice-provost J.D. Hamilton, admits there is simply no way to accurately determine the number of tenure committees at U of T.

Wasserman says in the letter the maximum number of tenure committees would be equal to the number of professors up for tenure in any given year, a figure he does not mention.

He says the minimum number would not be possible to get.

Some parts of U of T do not even grant tenure, for instance: Innis College, Massey College, the Extension division, the School of Graduate Studies, and the Royal Conservatory of Music.

Arts and Science is one faculty where counting tenure committees becomes difficult according to Wasserman's letter.

"At the beginning of the year, each department chairman writes to the dean suggesting membership for tenure committees for that particular department," the letter says.

"In some instances a chairman will suggest one committee for all candidates for that department."

"In other instances there will be a different committee recommended for each candidate..."

"The minimum number of tenure committees (for Arts and Science) would be 22, assuming each department for that year had candidates for tenure and the maximum would be equal to the number of tenure candidates."

"The dean (Bob Greene) has indicated a fair amount of work would be involved to get the precise number of different committees!"

Discipline talks hold no hope

SAC, the GSU, APUS, and Simcoe Hall have decided that the "discipline show" must go on, and that it did Monday afternoon at the pharmacy building.

Neither students nor paternalistic administrators were able to come to any substantive agreements and it's quite obvious from the start of these "negotiations" that a wide gulf exists between the two contending estates in the university.

The administration made itself look foolish on several occasions while the students sitting around the bargaining table tried in vain to discuss discipline principles and procedures—both academic and non-academic.

SAC negotiator Seymour Kanowitch summed up the fruitless discussion: "I think this is perhaps characteristic of the entire negotiating that's been going on surrounding this question of discipline at the University of Toronto. It seems that the negotiations on behalf of Simcoe Hall and of the Governing Council fail to realize that discipline does not exist in a vacuum.

"Discipline is explicitly tied to both the academic and governmental structures within the University of Toronto and you can't divorce it. You have to talk about it in terms of a whole. So there are very definitely prerequisites before you can talk about any type of discipline structure—be it academic or non-academic."

Monday's negotiations were also marred by several administration manoeuvres:

• The Varsity attempted to tape the proceedings so that we could not be accused of misrepresenting or misquoting the administration's position. The people from Simcoe Hall have already been inconsistent in their position on discipline and we wanted to make sure we had some evidence of these inconsistencies.

Internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway attempted to deal with the "procedural question" (as she put it) of taping the meetings, but found little support for her attempt to turn off the tape recorder.

Strenuous opposition to taped proceedings came from Academic Affairs chairman Jack Dove and faculty administration member Gary Thaler.

Students defended the taping by referring to the fact that Governing Council meetings are taped.

Although we didn't mention it at the meeting it's also important to note that John Evans and Jill Conway tape visitors in their offices. The difference in this case is that our tape recorder was above the desk; John Evans' for one is not in full view in his office and he neglects to tell you that he is taping you.

We also felt it was necessary to have the proceedings taped so that Internal Affairs chairwoman Marlene Paikin could not again accuse students of engaging in a "systematic campaign of innuendo", as she and other including Dove did before the Christmas break.

• The administration—Paikin and Conway in particular emphasized that the proceedings were known to the administration as "discussions", not negotiations, and that the members of the 'discussion' group were merely to pass their comments on the discipline code onto the appropriate committees of the governing council (internal and academic).

So, in effect, the present proceedings are not decisive in any decision-making sense. The administration has called the shots and will not let students believe that any substantial progress on the discipline code will be forthcoming.

What the administration appears to be doing, once again, is bargaining in bad faith, pretending to negotiate yet only buying time until March when students will be too busy to become involved in discipline. The administration is obviously attempting to maintain a 'low profile'.

• The administration also wants to 'discuss' during reading week, when the Varsity doesn't print and students won't be able to obtain any information. The administration maintains such discussion is necessary so that proposals for change can go forward to the Executive Committee meeting of March 12.

Unfortunately the Governing Council will break precedent and schedule its final March meeting on the last Thursday of the month, instead of the customary third Thursday of every month. This is being done so that the Governing Council won't have to meet over the public school break.

Several students members as well as the Varsity were unable to understand why the public school break would interfere with the Governing Council's business, and the administration members neglected to fill in the blank left hanging in the air.

Most student members also found it extremely ironic and somewhat callous on the administration's part that the public school break would take precedence over communication to students over reading week. (Some administrators were slightly embarrassed at the contradiction.)

• Internal's Paikin also made a rather uncalled for statement, we feel, in discussing the Victoria University Student's Administrative Council (VUSAC) brief on discipline, presented to the academic and internal affairs committees.

Paikin accused VUSAC of "quite clearly stating the SAC position that there were preconditions to the implementation of the code". She added that VUSAC "quote, spouted the party line." We were somewhat surprised to find hear such a statement, even from chairwoman Paikin.

When the student were able to discuss more serious matters they were repeatedly stymied. SAC president Anderson asked to have the academic sections of the code altered so that a professor that increased or changed course assignments to a student's detriment mid-way through the academic term could be penalized.

Law professor Jack Swan responded that some slight amendment might be made, but declined to speak of the principle involved or the rights of students to academic protection from perhaps well-meaning but incompetent professors.

The students present at the 'discussions' also attempted to have the non-academic sections of the code revised to allow for some rights for students to dissent and protest against unfair treatment by the administration's authorities.

Unfortunately, the talks ended with the administration agreeing to submit a list of areas where faculty and administration must have power, and the students agreeing to submit a list outlining under what conditions must be bound by a non-academic code.

This subject is on the agenda for the second discussion session this afternoon.

SAC president Anderson also asked to have two other items put on the agenda for today's meeting: the position of chairmen in the hearing of cases and the assessing of penalties; and the implications of the Governing Council's refusal to recognize the fight that students must give their consent before any discipline code is implemented.

(The chairmen on the hearings are at present appointed by the administration and they alone determine the penalty to be applied.)

In general the meeting was not very productive. The refusal of the administration spokespersons to deal with the substantive issues only made us realize that these people are merely playing games.

Time should now be spent in organizing discussion groups with other students, not with the administration.

SAC should have realized that discussions are fruitless; there is no common ground for students and administrators.

Although we respect the students who are negotiating for their optimism and intestinal fortitude, we still believe they are wasting their time discussing the code with the administration.

And, as our elected student representatives, when they waste their time they also waste ours.

Uncle Mitchell tied firmly to Uncle Sam

It seemed like such a simple straight-forward request last November.

Thirteen Members of Parliament politely asked External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp to take the issue of political prisoners in Vietnam to the United Nations.

Nor was it a radical request. The UN has long been the sort of international laughing stock that one would have thought Sharp would have said yes quickly just to get the issue off his back.

But the ways of Ottawa are never that simple.

Canada has been tied to US foreign policy—indeed an integral part of US foreign policy—for too long for Uncle Mitchell to blithely say: "Sure, fellows."

In fact, Sharp and his fellow cabinet ministers have pussyfooted on this issue just as the Liberal Government has pussyfooted on almost any Vietnam-related issue which runs contrary to US foreign interests.

Raising the issue of the political prisoners does indeed contradict US foreign policy and Uncle Mitchell is being careful not to step on Uncle Sam's toes.

The US has financed, is financing and has appropriated the necessary funds to continue to finance South Vietnam's prison system, a system which violates the accords of January, 1973, as well as outraging humanity.

External affairs thinks in the world of diplomacy and international relations, and not in the world of human beings being jailed, tortured, beaten and murdered.

So naturally, Mitchell doesn't think in terms of the massive human suffering of upwards of 100,000 persons. He thinks of international diplomacy.

He also thinks like a banana republic colonial servant. His response to NDP MP Andrew Brewin was to the effect: If it's so all-fired important, why hasn't someone else raised the issue already?

Come on, now. That's like saying Canada cannot do anything unless someone else does it first. Just which external affairs minister was chaffing at the bit to get his troops to Vietnam first for peacekeeping?

The problem here is the same problem which has plagued Canadian foreign policy for years now.

The federal government is so tied to Washington it simply cannot do anything Washington might not approve of.

There's a wealth of humanitarian reasons for Canada to make the gesture at the UN, ineffective as the UN is.

As Brewin said: "Even the most cynical could see world opinion could help."

That's where it's at, right now. Mobilizing world opinion against the American and Thieu violations of the accords.

There's also good political (albeit selfish) reasons for Canada to be the country to lead the way.

After running errand-boy for LBJ in Vietnam during the 1960s, as documented in the Pentagon Papers, Canada could show some refreshing independence of foreign policy by saying: "Look, Dick. You're wrong, we're going to the UN."

Canada really has been dishonorably silent. If Sharp wants to preserve some of his maudlin rhetoric about Canada being a 'humanitarian' country, he would be wise to listen to the MPs knocking on his door.

We strongly urge students and all members of the university community to write Mitchell Sharp condemning his inaction in this matter.

SAC rep denounces SAC over discipline

At the January meeting of the Governing Council, the political battle around the discipline code ended in a stalemate.

In the interim, Robert Anderson, SAC president, and Seymour Kanowitch, a declared SAC presidential candidate, have undertaken the task of negotiations with Simcoe Hall. We are told that this is to "buy time" for the organizing drive to repeal the Cadario-Conway Code.

The dubious value of this dual strategy notwithstanding, we should use the time effectively. We are currently involved in an internal political debate. This debate has taken a new turn: away from united action. It seems that the only course is to make the debate more external.

Two codes

The situation presently involves two discipline codes and two methods of analyzing them. The students closest to the events have been polarized into two opposing camps.

Because of this, the third position, one which posed unity in action while protecting a division in analysis, has been virtually destroyed.

The first of the two conceived discipline codes, code one, is the repressive code that is described in most of the literature, to date. It is made up of non-academic portions from the Cadario-Conway Code (C-C) which deal with demonstrations, conspiracies, the leaking of documents, and the misuse of university facilities. Code one also contains some portions from the academic section of Cadario-Conway, in particular penalties that are too harsh, and an unfair advantage given to professors.

The other code, code two, is contained partly in C-C and partly in the Campbell Report (see note).

This code is not as well documented as the other. It is more in the form of principle.

Code two treats faculty and students equally with respect to discipline. Students are given the right to redress their grievances. The code calls for an agreement on teaching, course content, marking scheme, etc., at the classroom level to avoid later misunderstandings. Demonstrations should not be treated by organizational fiat but by political discussion of the issues.

There are two positions among students concerning the correct method of approaching the problem of discipline; there have always been these two basic opinions, now the situation has polarized.

The first position accepts the need for discipline or an arbitrary force—the administration which stands between the faculty and the students.

Some students are content with C-C, some are content with the status quo, with the administration ruling as a benevolent dictator. Most students, however, are in favor of an equal student-faculty status. They want code two, the Campbell report, or a formulation that doesn't specifically deal with discipline but guarantees that the administration will not act arbitrarily, or with a faculty bias.

The second political position sees the administration as either the only evil, or the greater of the twin evils, faculty and administration. The students have no use for a code, it would be used against only students. Political disagreements should be handled through direct contact, or confrontation, with the faculty.

A third position

Since there is great overlap in the less extreme areas of both positions, a third position was devised to bridge the gap. This position, repeal Cadario-Conway now, negotiate later, is designed to get rid of code one through united action.

People who want no codes can certainly support this position, and people who really want to see code number two might support such a position. The bone of contention at the present moment is that getting rid of code one might scuttle attempts to get rid of code two.

The cohesion of this third united front position is based more in the real situation than the other two. The Cadario-Conway code is here, now, it must be dealt with now. However, the theoretical differences are certainly just as real. The discussion, given that the united front is destroyed, returns to the plane of student power.

Student power

The history of events at U of T indicates on all issues involving basic changes in structures—disciplines, party, teaching, daycare, library, budget-cut—the only force with a chance to win, is the organized and visible student support. Student power.

The objective of the third position was to organize student power. In particular it allows the supporters of both positions to put their best efforts into getting the students out.

If one group feels the other group is being counterproductive, then they are justified, in their own minds, in withdrawing from any compromise position and organizing around their own set of demands.

This has happened. SAC has decided to withdraw from the repeal campaign because they want code two and feel that repealing Cadario-Conway is counterproductive. Also, the Revolutionary Marxist Group has withdrawn and has stated its own reasons for doing so. It wants to call for no codes at all.

This means the posters and the petition campaign have been, at worst, a waste of time for SAC and at best a diversionary tactic aimed at getting Simcoe Hall to act more reasonably.

SAC wants now to organize student power in favour of code two and not so much in opposition to code one. The difference is only in emphasis.

SAC's dilemma

The progress of SAC, presupposing consistent support of code two, is a curious history. In 1969, SAC endorsed the newly released Campbell report as the basis for any discipline procedures. The report was introduced in an atmosphere of hysteria surrounding a report published by 14 Ontario university presidents.

Quoting liberally from a similar report issued by Harvard University, the presidents argued "violence" cannot be tolerated in a free academic environment, and student dissent must be dealt with quickly and ruthlessly.

Student reaction was quick but not very clear. Bissell, then university president, promised to use reason and logic when dealing with issues and instituted a party committee to discuss the issue. Most students surmised that this was an implicit promise not to call cops on campus.

Because of an impasse similar to the one we have at this time, discipline was forced underground for a cooling-off period.

In 1971-72 the acting president, Jack Sword called cops on campus on two occasions.

Swords actions were met with large scale student opposition but the issue of discipline remained essentially underground until the fall of this school year.

At the October 3 SAC meeting, Anderson argued against rejection of the code outright. Previously he had argued there had not been enough discussion. At this time, Anderson argued that the non-academic portions of the code, code one, were inoperable. He submitted a statement that "made fun" of the legalisms in the code, based mainly on its vague formulations.

Anderson had consistently argued the academic section of the code was in fact code two and thus acceptable. There were some flaws but they could be corrected through horse-trading. He demanded a strong SAC stand on the question but never got it.

Cadario-Conway was interpreted by Anderson, and possibly by SAC as follows:

The inclusion of features of code two was a major coup — it outweighed the features of code one in the same document. Repressive measures in the code were either inoperable, too harsh to be used, or if used would be the basis of organizing the students against the administration in general. In any event, caution should be exercised during demonstrations.

Anderson only a variation on Cadario's theme.

This has to be the rationale, give or take a few points, of Paul Cadario, the token student, and possibly major proponent of code two, when working out the detailed recommendations.

Cadario still believes his role to be progressive in terms of student rights. Since Cadario worked on the election campaign of Bob Anderson we can only assume that Anderson is attempting to continue the policy mapped out by Cadario.

Thus the SAC line has always been in favour of code two, and in favor of getting support among the general student population for their views. Unfortunately, for them, they found that students were indifferent to code two, and only seemed to mobilize against code one. In order to gain support for their position, SAC entered the united front.

There is nothing sinister in their entry, the question mark is around their exit. The tactics used by SAC executives in the initial meetings showed a lack of skill in supporting the position of the united front on one hand and pushing their own position on the other.

SAC was forced to resort in debating tricks, such as excessive and slanderous red-baiting, and organizational measures such as the SAC holiday mailings. The result has been the situation we have today — total confusion.

SAC waffles on repeal

One logical reason for being against supporting the repeal campaign is that rejection of Cadario Conway without posing an alternative leaves the students victim to the status quo.

The status quo, as interpreted by SAC to be Caput (see note). There are two recent examples of this body acting in the past that indicates the true nature of the body.

In the first case, an individual student was treated too harshly when caught cheating. We can only assume, not knowing the legal facts, that the person was "guilty." According to the present SAC position, that person should be assigned a mark of zero in the course.

The faculty decided that loss of year and suspension would be a better "punishment." Caput upheld this view and the student was essentially kicked-out. SAC feels that this sort of thing must be fought, through the use of Code two.

The second incident indicates that the Caput is as much a political organization as it is a deliberative body. When asked to intervene in the library-bust sit-in that followed the arrest of students by metro police, they spoke very clearly: "We cannot deliberate on this case because the students involved would not accept the legitimacy of our decision."

There's a moral there, somewhere.

The administration is calling the shots in the current political battle. We can make abstract choices between code one, code two, or caput (no-code) for long periods of time. However it would benefit the credibility of Governing Council if everyone keeps talking until June. The current actions of SAC fit this schema very well.

If the Governing Council passes the discipline code in June, the clauses may be inoperative according to Anderson, but we have to wait until someone gets busted before an effective organizing can begin.

Who wants to be first?

SAC is currently trying to cover up obvious political differences by using full-page ads, and other devices stemming from their financial power.

This should stop.

The use of a referendum has been mentioned, except prior debate has been sadly lacking.

SAC should try to find support for this position by taking the issues and different positions to the students, they should have been doing that at the beginning of the year.

Notes:

- The Campbell Report was drafted by a committee of 10 (three students), and released in 1969. The committee was set up because of student pressure in opposition to the existing procedures. The report was shelved almost immediately. Common opinion is that political pressure from the faculty was responsible for this.

- Caput is a consortium of administration hacks representing different constituencies of the university. They deal with different matters on discipline of a university wide or multi-faculty nature. The president of SAC is a non-voting assessor member. The body also functions as a method of giving campus groups official sanction.

Torontonians are apathetic: grape picketer

A couple of Saturdays ago many of us woke up early, bundled up to brave the cold and prepared to face grocery shoppers at various Dominion stores. Our usual crew showed up to distribute leaflets and inform the public about the boycott of California grapes and lettuce. Our support came from a grade nine girl, a high school student from Scarborough, three University of Toronto students, two seminarians and a computer programmer. Later we were joined by three members of a local plumbing union.

We were back at our usual store of two months, passing out leaflets that ask the customers not to buy US grapes and lettuce and not to shop at Dominion in order to make the boycott effective. Despite the fact the boycott has received official support from such diverse groups as city councils, the Canadian Council of Churches, school boards, the various labour unions and the Toronto Star, Dominion continues in refusing to co-operate. Pressure is being applied to Dominion in spearheading the boycott because they are the largest grape outlet in the city.

Around noon two Metro policemen informed us that we had to vacate the parking lot and continue our picketing from the sidewalk. Experienced by now, we stood our ground and asked by what authority were we being subject to move. As we expected the man most concerned by our activities, the manager, had made a complaint. We informed the constable, who was making an attempt to remain neutral, that the Dominion store manager had no authority to speak on behalf of the plaza owners whose property we were picketing on. This gave an additional half hour to continue our work of informing the consumer. Then suddenly our police friends were back, this time with an explicit ultimatum from headquarters. We had to move off the parking lot or be arrested for trespassing.

Rather than continue picketing from the sidewalk where it is impossible to speak with customers, we went to the Lawrence and Markham Dominion store where we picketed for the remainder of the afternoon. Here the manager felt responsible enough to remove the grapes from the counter but could not see himself around to taking the lettuce off as well. He felt that this would push the customers too far.

When one pickets a Dominion store it is the customers that one discovers, a customer who works to earn a living and as a citizen pays taxes and is entitled to decide according to his beliefs about justice and his needs. If anything the picket line provides the greatest opportunity to poll the public attitude about consumer responsibility. Unless a person is totally uninvolved or apathetic, their affiliation to either church, civil council or union should strike a responsive chord in their conscience. Well, if Dominion customers are an accurate representation of social concern in Toronto, there is indication of a great lack of faith, duty and solidarity within our midst. One elderly lady said she just had to go in because potato chips were on special. A middle-aged man absolutely needed to buy the latest encyclopedia volume to add to his series. One distinguished gentleman, after briefly hearing my plea for support shouted, "shit on that, let them work for a living." Many working men affiliated with unions are sympathetic but often respond with, "what the hell can I do when the wife likes shopping here." Others voiced support that they wouldn't buy grapes or lettuce, but going to another store to shop was asking too much.

Then there are those rare concerned, intelligent and critical people whose sense of justice is mature in their conscience. They listen, ask penetrating questions, and, after weighing the facts give their support by refusing to shop at Dominion until they agree to support the right of farmworkers. To have 20 to 30 such turn-aways in a day from the cash registers of Dominion gives us a renewed sense of hope in our purpose and a knowledge that these are people who have a genuine concern for their fellow man.

In this case our fellow man is the California farmworkers, a people who have found their strength and dignity in their growing unity for social justice. For many years they were virtually a slave labour force that the growers could exploit for their own corporate profit. It was only through his consistency to the Ghandi-King model of non-violent social protest that Cesar Chavez was able to begin organizing farmworkers in 1962. Previously they had been specifically excluded from labour legislation which would allow them to organize for a decent standard of living and tolerable working conditions that we take so much for granted. Their demands were simple. They wanted the right to sit down and negotiate with the growers about working conditions including hours per day, availability of drinking water, rest periods, toilet facilities, controlled use of pesticides (which takes a heavy toll in workers' lives) and the right to run hiring halls.

It took five years of boycotting before the growers signed contracts with the UFW in 1970. With the provision of the basic need of food and shelter the farmworkers were able to finally have some self-respect for the first time in their lives. Nevertheless, the resentful growers resolved to crush the UFW union as the three years contract expired last spring, by using the Teamsters' union to this end. The growers signed sweetheart contracts with the Teamsters that were never ratified by the farmworkers.

On April 18, 1973, Cesar Chavez called the second strike and boycott. The Teamsters union provided hired thugs to intimidate and terrorize farmworkers and their supporters. In this struggle two chicano farmworkers were murdered, hundreds were hospitalized and thousands arrested. Chavez then decided that the union would call off the picket and devote all its energy to the boycott. Thirty-one workers then came to Toronto, the third largest consumer of California table grapes in the world. They will remain here until the boycott is successful and the growers are prepared to sit down and negotiate contracts.

The only thing that will convince the growers to sign is the loss of sales. If the Toronto supermarkets refuse to sell their grapes, the growers will feel that much more pressure to accede to the grapeworkers' demands. It is up to the people of Toronto to tell Dominion, by refusing to shop in Dominion Stores, that they support the right of agricultural workers to the standards of dignity, health and material well-being the rest of us take for granted.

Leftist sects alienate students

In a rather laughable letter in last Friday's Varsity, the so-called Revolutionary Marxist Group announced its departure from the Committee to Repeal the Discipline Code.

The group claimed the committee was undermined when Students' Administrative Council members joined representatives from the other central student councils on campus in discussions with the U of T administration about the code. You can't organize students against the code if you're negotiating, the RMG claimed.

The facts are that far from the committee being undermined by negotiations, the major reason for its failure to involve more students has been the endless posturing of the RMG itself. When the latest campaign against the discipline code began in November, several students unassociated with leftist political sects or the student councils attended planning meetings. They were quickly turned off by the tedious contributions of the RMG and the Young Socialists whose numerous members on hand each offered a different nuance of the same predetermined Line.

What these left sects don't realize, or are patently insensitive to, is that most students who aren't members of their groups don't necessarily hold previously determined positions on any given issue. By coming together in groups such as the Committee to Repeal the Discipline Code, they hope to discuss their views and develop a position and strategy through that free discussion.

The process is completely obstructed by the presence of large numbers of left sect members who insist on re-capitulating "The Line". People less politically experienced are often intimidated, cowed into silence, or leave in disgust or despair.

Political groups which are basically irrelevant to the needs of most U of T students shouldn't be allowed to obstruct their legitimate struggles in the university.

Because of their bull-headed insensitivity to this phenomenon, RMG and YS domination of Committee meetings almost always degenerated into Trotskyist diatribes against SAC participation in negotiations, followed by SAC responses. Only at the end of each session did people consider actual organizing methods — too late for serious treatment.

Although the RMG is quick to criticize SAC for pursuing its own discipline policy (debated in open meetings, as opposed to the RMG's which was determined in its usual closed meetings) the RMG never hesitated to put forth its own "No to Any Code" position when it suited its purposes. At a public forum last month, one of its members launched into an explanation of the RMG discipline line, even though he was appearing as a representative of the Committee for Repeal.

So now the RMG is leaving, charging that SAC undermined the Committee!

SAC believes that most students support repeal of the Code of Behaviour, but would not support a refusal by their representatives to discuss the matter with Simcoe Hall. Negotiations in no way impede the effort to gather signatures on the petition against the Code. Wasting time listening to RMG rhetoric does.

Many students independent of left groups and not part of student councils are now actively continuing the campaign against the code. The campaign will not miss the void posturing of the RMG.

Coverage of PC conference was distorted

As one who attended the Federal Progressive Conservative Policy Conference in Toronto last Saturday, I must take strong issue with coverage of the event as presented in Monday's Varsity by Michael Edwards.

First, it was Mr. Edwards and not Mr. Stanfield who decided that the major problem facing the average Canadian was an "Economically unsound savings bond." Mr. Stanfield spent a good deal of his speech pointing out that the present rate of inflation (approaching 10 per cent per annum) is making it extremely difficult for the average Canadian to save anything but a small portion of his income. Mr. Stanfield was speaking about inflation, he mentioned the word 10 times in a 15 minute speech. Nowhere in Mr. Edwards' article is the word inflation mentioned. I hesitate to criticize Mr. Edwards' grasp of economic terminology, but I feel the subject of Mr. Stanfield's speech warrants some mention.

The example of the decline in sales of Canada Savings Bonds was used by Mr. Stanfield to emphasize the fact that the average Canadian no longer finds it attractive to invest in the CSB programme because of the poor and sometimes non-existent realized return. Mr. Stanfield's proposal to correlate the Canada Savings Bond to the Consumer Price Index may or may not be economically viable. It is however a constructive proposal aimed at assisting the small investor.

Secondly, I suggest that Mr. Edwards' paraphrasing of Mr. Stanfield's remark: "It's wonderful to see you passing all these resolutions, even though we don't pay any attention to them," is badly distorted by out-of-context reference. Mr. Stanfield, noted for a certain wry humour, intended this as a joke and it was taken as such by the rest of the 200 people present. While it was humorous, this remark does underline a serious problem in our Parliamentary system. Mr. Edwards could have made capital of this in his article. The relationship between a party's 'rank and file' and its elected representatives was a subject dealt with at some length by Mr. Stanfield. Again this should have warranted some mention.

Thirdly, Mr. Edwards' reference to the noticeable absence of provincial premier Bill Davis at a federal policy conference leads him to conclude that Mr. Davis is or appears to be "the black sheep of the PC family." This is a wonderful example of 'journalistic licence' or what is termed to be in more liberal circles, 'plain old bullshit!' While this may seem to be a gem of logical deduction it is in truth nothing more than unsubstantiated extrapolation, on the part of Mr. Edwards.

Finally, for those who are willing to take a few moments in pursuit of truth it would be worthwhile to read the Globe and Mail's coverage of the event. February 14th, page 4. A comparison of these articles accentuates the difference between proper objective reporting and the poor subjective reporting given us by Mr. Edwards.

In the interests of kindness I would note that such a comparison would be unfair to Mr. Edwards and even more so to the Globe.

SAC negotiators selling out

In March, the Governing Council meets to implement the structures and procedures of the so-called academic sections of the Conway-Cadario discipline code. The administration has made it clear that this is the first part of their plan to implement in stages the entire discipline code.

They have been forced to take this "gradual" approach because the campaign of students to repeal the code has prevented them from implementing the code at Governing Council meetings in November and January.

The campaign to repeal the code must continue to be built or the Governing Council will succeed this March. The steering committee against the discipline code must now use the valuable time that students have gained to build the campaign to repeal the code.

However, in the face of the impending implementation of the code in March, two of the organizations that were active in the steering committee have quit. They have dropped from the committee when unity in the struggle to repeal the code is most imperative.

The U of T Communist Club and the Revolutionary Marxist Group attempted to extend the basis of unity beyond that which everyone had previously agreed upon—the repeal of the Conway-Cadario discipline code. The CP attempted to impose a demand for an alternative code in addition to the demand for repeal, while the RMG claimed that there can be no unity on repeal unless SAC stops negotiations with the administration.

Both of these positions were destined to drive groups and individuals from the committee because the adoption of either of them was unacceptable to everyone in the committee.

Although it has not formally altered its adopted position which is for repeal of the code, SAC is also undercutting the campaign to win repeal by entering into negotiations in order to amend the academic section of the Conway-Cadario code. In so doing, SAC, like the CP and RMG, has shifted its efforts away from the fight to repeal the code. It too is abstaining from the burning need to build a mass campaign for repeal.

SAC's responsibility is to throw its resources into organizing the campaign for repeal, a campaign based on the mass mobilization of students—the only force that can win repeal. Instead, without our consultation and in the face of growing support for repeal, SAC has decided to negotiate on behalf of students. This means SAC is willing to accept something less than repeal. It means SAC sees any mobilization of students not as the way to win repeal but as a means of improving its ability to "impose" an amended academic section of the code, with accompanying structures and procedures, on the administration. By this sleight of hand, SAC hopes to present an amended code to students as a big victory won through the skillful parleying of SAC negotiators.

In fact the only victor will be the administration. After five years of persistent effort and in the face of continual student opposition, the administration will finally have an operative discipline code at this university. After student opposition dies down a bit, a non-academic section can be added to further bolster the administration's ability to restrict and limit our potential to defend and extend our rights.

SAC's willingness to negotiate rather than mobilize students for repeal is crucial to the success of this administrative manoeuvre. And so far, SAC negotiators have shown themselves to be more than willing to accommodate the administration by playing according to the rules of the negotiating game.

The Young Socialists totally reject the SAC negotiations and we will continue to argue uncompromisingly against them. As well, we are opposed to any alternative code. We will continue to actively participate in the committee to repeal the discipline code on the basis of the demand for repeal of the code. We do not make the adoption of our positions against negotiations, against alternative codes, and for no code, a condition for our continued participation in the committee.

We will not quit the only organization capable of building the campaign to repeal the code and thereby abstain from the struggle.

The Conway-Cadario code must be repealed. Its ramifications extend beyond U of T. Already the administration at the University of Alberta in Edmonton is planning to implement a similar code of behaviour once the precedent is set at U of T.

Petitioning tables must be set up to gather more support. Further endorsements for the repeal position must be gathered from student and faculty groups and organizations. Another meeting of the committee to repeal the discipline code must be called to map further plans to build the campaign.

The RMG and the CP must join the committee. SAC must throw its considerable resources into the fight for repeal. The March Governing Council meeting is fast-approaching. This is no time to abstain from the struggle. All groups and individuals who support repeal of the code should unite to build the committee and the campaign.

Trin to include students on tenure committees

By BOB BETTSON

The Trinity College Council has voted to join Innis college and the sociology department in adding students to tenure and other staffing committees.

Student representation, but not parity, was approved Monday at the meeting of the council.

The resolution providing for student representation was adopted by a vote of 26-8 by the predominantly faculty body.

There are 11 students on the more than 50 member council.

The recommendation contains a selection mechanism choosing students by lot from those willing and able to serve. The only prerequisite is two courses in the subject area.

The representation was proposed by a committee composed of English professor Milton Wilson, vice provost William Rogers and student member Pen Hampson.

A move by professor J. W. Cole to delay the decision until the university made its decision was overwhelmingly rejected.

After an hour-long debate the decisive votes were cast but not before strong support and opposition from some of the academics present.

Classics professor D. J. Conacher, said he was out to "polarize" the debate and did just that, asserting students are not only not the best judges of teaching ability but don't have the experience or maturity to make judgements on scholarly work and overall academic competence.

Roger answered by saying these arguments were convincing on parity but not on representation. He reminded the committee they would have influence on the U of T decision but not to shrink from addressing the problem.

German professor Allan Latta said he thought students would "politicize" the decision making process on tenure, not at Trinity but in the university, citing the expressly political positions of SAC and the Varsity.

English professor Sheldon Zitner raised the question of the selection process as inadequate and criticized the part of the motion specifically giving the student responsibility for finding out student opinion on teaching quality.

He added a reluctance to sit on tenure committees should be the prime factor in a positive decision who could sit.

Former arts and science associate dean Gordon Watson told the council students "should be represented because they have an important point of view. We should not follow the rest of the university on this matter."

Though there was no opposition to students sitting on promotion and cross-appointments committees there was quite lengthy discussion back and forth on the quality of student representation.

Though no students spoke at the meeting it was apparent they had previously convinced a large number of faculty to support student representation on the committees.

Cole questioned the security of having students on the committee saying confidentiality was "absolutely necessary."

After a summary by philosophy lecturer Derek Allan answering the arguments against student representation the vote was held.

Allan said students already had the power through the selection of courses to affect a professor's appointment.

He added many arguments were a speculative and could not be proved on the possible evils of student representation.

The selection process was passed by a reduced margin of 18-11 with eight abstentions and the responsibility for evaluating teaching was passed 18-7 with four abstentions.

United States gobbles Canada's resources

The following article appeared in April, 1970, in The Last Post. It explains in detail some of the problems with the oil - and indeed energy resource - 'crisis' of the 1970's. Although written four years ago the article perceptively analyzes the world market in terms of energy resources, adopting the theme of American imperialism and conversely, Canadian colonialism.

The Last Post is a monthly alternate news magazine distributed across Canada and produced at 430 King St. West, Suite 101, Toronto 135, Ontario. This article is reprinted with their permission.

Gordon Cleveland was formerly employed with the federal industry, trade and commerce department.

By GORDON CLEVELAND adapted from THE LAST POST

The sell-out of Canadian resources revolves around an elusive political Snark labelled the "continental energy policy", a major watershed in the waning of this country's political independence in the face of American economic imperatives.

For some time Canadian and American officials have been meeting regularly to negotiate this scheme, which would lift all national barriers to the flow of Canadian oil, gas, water and coal to the increasingly thirsty markets of the northern industrial United States.

Since the beginning of the Nixon administration, increasing pressure has been brought on Ottawa to embark on the long negotiation road towards a North American free market in energy, which would open lucrative US markets to the Alberta oil and gas producers, but at a staggering political price.

It is a scheme that would set up a central authority on what resources would be exploited, how transported, to what markets, and at what prices. A sort of Common Market in oil water and gas, it would mean that only the most profitable resources would be exploited, principally for the markets that need them most. It would constitute a suspension of national political considerations for economic expediency.

It would also mean plugging our energy production even further and irretrievably into the industrial needs of the United States, abdicating what tattered vestiges remain of an independent Actually the idea of the continental energy policy was not new. It has been occasionally mentioned before in Ottawa, and has been long-mooted in the North American petroleum industry. Prime Minister Trudeau, when he visited President Nixon in Washington in 1969 spoke favorably and hopefully about forming a continental energy policy. But this was mentioned in passing, and received scarcely any attention.

In fact, negotiations towards setting up a such a continental plan had been going on between the two governments before Trudeau's visit.

But everything was being done quietly, outside the glare of national attention, without any suspicion on the public's part that one of the biggest economic deals ever considered by Canada and the United States was under negotiation.

Just a few dull tariff negotiations, with the odd little item appearing in the financial pages. Just some talks about a field of which most reporters understood nothing, and the public even less. Just something that, once consummated, would be hailed as a Liberal government victory in priming the oil and gas and hydro industries.

II. Seven Sisters of Leviathan

As Washington reporter Jack Anderson noted in 1967: "The State Department has often taken its policies right out of the executive suites of the oil companies. When Big Oil can't get what it wants in foreign countries, the State Department tries to get it for them. In many countries, the American Embassies function virtually as branch offices for the oil combine..."

The naked political power of the oil combines has shown its hand clearly many times in recent world history. One might talk about how Iran, which tried in 1951 to nationalize its oil industry, was punished by an effective boycott of Iranian oil. The boycott launched a political crisis which ended in the deposition of Dr. Mossadegh's government in a coup directed and organized by the Central Intelligence Agency. The story ended happily for the US empire - the British got back a fair percentage of their oil properties, American oil companies got a much larger share of lands than previously, and the leading CIA representative in the coup later became Government Relations Director for the Gulf Oil Corporation in Washington.

The domination of the Western World over the Third World, capped by the political and economic domination of the United States over both, and crowned by the domination of corporate enterprise over the public interest is simply and tersely set down in the political economy of resource exploitation - particularly energy and primarily oil.

And it is this:

The United States is the largest single consumer of resources in the world.

Although it accounts for only six per cent of the world's population, it consumes 35 to 50 per cent of the world's mineral and energy resources depleted annually.

Narrowing further, the United States also has the world's highest per capita energy consumption. By itself it uses 34 per cent of the world's energy.

- This breaks down into these components:
- 65 per cent of the world's natural gas
- 20 per cent of its solid fuels (mostly coal)
- 20 per cent of its hydroelectric and nuclear electricity
- 36 per cent of its liquid fuels (mostly oils)

The United States is the largest and most important single oil market in the world. Oil is the power base for the operation of the vast majority of its industrial enterprise.

The world oil market has historically been dominated and controlled by the seven major internationally integrated oil companies, commonly known as the "International Majors" or "The Seven Sisters".

In order of size based on sales, they are:

- Standard Oil of New Jersey
- Royal Dutch Shell
- Mobil
- Texas Oil (Texaco)
- Gulf Oil
- Standard Oil of California
- British Petroleum (BP)

With the exception of Shell, which is Dutch-owned, and BP, which is British-owned and half government-controlled, the International Majors are US-based, owned and controlled.

Sales of the five US majors in 1967 were $32 billion, or, one third of the Gross National Product of Canada.

This placed all five corporations among the top 12 industrial corporations in the United States.

Measured by profits, all five major oil companies were among the top seven industrial corporations in the United States.

In 1966, the US Majors' foreign investment represented 40 per cent of the total US direct investment overseas.

The five corporations had combined assets of about $40 billion, which is about one fifth of the total assets owned by the 100 largest US corporations.

In 1958, there were an estimated 190 US oil companies carrying on 598 separate operations in 91 countries.

In 1960 a Chase-Manhattan Bank study of the 32 principal oil companies in the US showed that they and their foreign operation produced over half (57 per cent) of all the crude oil in the non-Communist countries of the world. This included 62.9 per cent in the US; 54.3 per cent in the Middle East; 67.7 per cent in Canada.

In the most recent major study, in 1960, the Seven Sisters were shown to own over 70 per cent of all refining capacity in the non-Communist world.

This is the schema of the political economy of imperialism.

III. The international price structure

Essential to the domination of the International Majors is the maintenance of an artificially high world price structure for petroleum.

The Majors were able to sustain this artificial price-fixing structure because of their high vertical integration — that is, control over the exploration, the exploitation, the transport, the refining, and a large part of the market (gas outlets, for example). In short, vertical monopoly.

World prices, including Canadian, have historically been set to a level required to make US oil production economic. Prices in Venezuela and the Middle East, for example, were set by the US majors at a level high enough to guarantee profits for oil produced out of the "Gulf of Mexico Price Zone", the Texas producing region.

Thus even though companies like Jersey Standard and Gulf Oil in 1959 drew two thirds of their net income from foreign operations, it was important to their profits to keep the Gulf of Mexico prices as high as possible. And since the cost of production in the Middle East is at most one third of producing inside the US, it becomes crucial to the survival of the international cartels to maintain a high price level calibrated to the most expensive production area.

A task force set up by the Nixon administration reflected the magnitude of this price distortion. It revealed that if import restrictions into the US were lifted, and the country thrown open to the onslaught of cheap foreign-produced oil the domestic wellhead price of $3.30 per barrel would decline by 1980 to $1.87 a barrel.

Thus Washington, sensitive to the lobbies of this immensely powerful industrial sector, preserves the position of Texas oil from the competition of a cheaper external market, and delivers staggeringly inflated profits to the companies that explore in foreign countries.

The price-fixing knows no borders and extends directly into Canada. Here is an example of the operation of the price-control system in Canada in the late Fifties:

The price of oil at the wellhead in Western Canada in the late fifties varied between $2.50 and $2.65 a barrel. This price was set through a complicated procedure that assured that the price of Western oil in Central Canada would be the same as the price of oil from the closest major petroleum-producing centre in the US, in this case, Illinois. This assured that Canadian oil could not compete effectively with the bulk of American oil, even in Canada's own markets.

This $2.50 to $2.65 a barrel from the West, according to the Borden Commission on Energy of 1959, actually cost only slightly in excess of one dollar (not including taxes) to produce. That is the measure of American control over the continental and world market price.

It might seem logical that one Canadian producer could rebel against these prices and cut his far below the American level, while still retaining a handsome profit over his production costs.

This does not happen because:

- a) Sixty-two per cent of the Canadian oil industry is American controlled,
- b) it is in the interests of the oil producers to maintain the highest possible price, therefore profit,
- c) Any smaller Canadian producer who rebelled could be easily crushed in any price war,
- d) no one need worry about his price being undercut because imported oil from the international market is equally controlled.

As long as the companies play the game, they are prosperous and protected. If anyone tries to buck the game, he faces price wars, battles for markets and for supplies.

In this complex price-control system, coupled with the US control of Canadian oil production, already lies a continental energy policy.

But what the US wants extends even beyond this.

It's fair to begin to ask why our neighbor, who already sleeps with us when and if he chooses, is proposing marriage.

IV. Crisis in international oil

In the late Fifties and into the Sixties, the international oil market began to quaver. For the first time on any major scale, a world surplus of oil started developing. The patterns of control of the International Majors started becoming undone, and the world oil market started slowly shifting its face.

The Borden Commission in Canada, which had begun studying the oil industry in the late Fifties, found it necessary to note in the foreword of its 1959 report: "The North American and International oil market are passing through a period of rapid and perhaps fundamental change. This condition had not become obvious in the latter part of 1958, but since the Commission finished its public hearings in the fall of 1958, the world economy has been marked by the appearance of surpluses of crude oil and products, by more intense international competition for markets and by declining prices."

This increasing world competition stemmed from the rise of 20 to 30 smaller international companies which began breaking up the cosy party of the International Majors.

This group of intruding newcomers consisted of US firms such as Standard Oil of Indiana, Phillips Petroleum, Continental Oil, Atlantic Refining and Union Oil. But there were also important newcomers from other countries, such as the Japanese Arabian Oil Company and Ente Nazionale Idrocarburi (ENI) of Italy.

These became known as the "International Minors".

At the same time, forces of nationalism in oil-producing countries have led to a number of state-controlled firms, state control of share blocks in companies, state regulation of percentages of profits that must remain in countries of exploitation and increases in tariffs.

This together with the gradual increase of the International Minors, started a downward pressure on the international oil prices. With international prices declining, however, US prices have remained steady or gone up, in domestic market shielded by a high wall of quotas and tariffs.

This has shifted the base of profitability of the international oil industry from the Middle East and Venezuela — from foreign producing centres — to the United States.

In the late Fifties, as reported by the Borden Commission, two thirds of the net income of Standard Oil of New Jersey and of Gulf Oil came from foreign operations.

But in 1969, when the Chase Manhattan Bank surveyed the 29 leading firms in the US oil industry, it discovered that since 1959 the groups' entire earnings increase had come from domestic operation right in the US, which now account for 75 per cent of the total profits. If further reported that the return on capital invested overseas had dropped from 30 per cent a decade ago to only 12 per cent now. This evidently, reflects a gargantuan shift in the profitability of different sections of the international oil industry.

What has preserved the remarkable profitability of American oil has been the US import policy of 1959, in direct response to the looming crisis in international oil.

This was, simply, the erection of a quota wall around the US, which effectively sealed out the cheaper foreign oil. By thus sealing off the prime market, it was able to stabilize prices and, of course, protect the US oil industry.

This import policy, enshrined in diverse pieces of legislation established under the Eisenhower administration, was achieved largely at the insistence of the independent domestic producers who could be wiped out if their expensive production facilities were thrown into the competition of cheaper world oil. (These independents, with their Texas oil lobbies controlling a large number of Senatorial and Congressional votes, are more important in the US market than the International Majors, since the US Majors control only one third of crude oil reserves in the US, whereas in other countries they control 60 to 70 per cent of the reserves.)

The response of the Canadian government to the same crisis in international oil prices was the establishment of the Borden Commission, which resulted in the national oil policy established in 1961.

In Canada there had also been a battle between the independent petroleum interests and the International Majors, but the Majors were much stronger here than in the US. The bid of the independents for the same kind of security as the US independents in large part failed.

The independents were pushing hard for an Alberta-to-Montreal pipeline, in other words supplying Eastern Canadian markets by domestic crude oil rather than foreign. But the International Majors were powerful enough to keep this policy out. Eastern Canada continued after the 1961 policy up until today to be served by foreign (mostly Venezuelan) oil. And this foreign oil, of course, went largely to the giant Montreal refineries owned by the International Majors.

The substance of the 1961 policy was the division of the Canadian market into two parts — all of Canadian oil markets west of the Ottawa Valley were to be served by domestic (Alberta) oil; all markets east were to be served by imported foreign oil. This was a voluntary policy, rather than the mandatory US one, but since at the time it was the policy the Majors wanted, no one should be surprised that it was effectively followed for some years until material conditions began to change. This left the independents somewhat out in the cold, since the Western Canadian market is not profitable enough, so a natural corollary of the 1961 policy was that the federal government had to constantly push to get larger markets for Alberta oil in the United States in order to placate the independent Alberta producers. Clearly, the 1961 policy left Canada vulnerable to US whims and wishes, since Washington could, and did, impose quotas on our oil anytime it felt like it.

V. Struggle in the U.S.

But this set of policies in the two countries — the oil import policy in the US and the national oil policy in Canada — has begun to show a number of very large cracks. Powerful interest groups and forces in the United States are aligning themselves against the oil producers, in a confrontation between the Northeast and the Southwest.

The quota wall has raised US prices domestically and created such a disparity in petroleum costs between domestic and foreign crude that the heavily industrial US Northeast is beginning to rebel against the prices set by the oil producers in the Southwest.

New England senators and congressmen, representing Northeastern industry, have been pressing for a policy which would allow foreign imports to come in at a controlled rate, thus providing cheaper oil.

The wide-spread lobbying power of the industry — particularly in its home territory, the South — has enabled oilmen to shrug off the liberal gadflies for the last 43 years, since the profitable depletion allowance tax provision was voted in.

But to the industry's old liberal opposition has been added the recent revolt of northern consumers against rising prices (gasoline prices have shot up), a revolt against bigness in industry, and a taxpayers' revolt.

The South now has the oil and the North the heating problems; the South industrial growth and New England growing stagnation and high fuel costs.

New England consumers have focussed their demands on a request to build a refinery at Machiasport, Maine, and are demanding for it an import allocation of 100,000 barrels a day.

The low-cost oil which would come out of such a refinery would be sufficient to undermine northern oil prices. But even worse, in Southern minds, this break in the 11-year-long import quota program would set a precedent very likely to lead eventually to the total destruction of the program itself, and with it the vast protected market which has guaranteed high profits for so many years.

The US oil interests would much rather compromise on a continental oil scheme which would bring comparatively high cost Canadian oil into the market. The US government seems to be bending over backwards to support this kind of compromise, and Nixon has consistently refused to pass judgement on the Machiasport plan, always saying that further studies have to be made on a total review of US oil policy.

The main battlefield for the fight between the producers and consumers in the US has been a series of hearings on the petroleum industry held by Michigan senator Philip A. Hart's Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee, as well as hearings conducted by a special task force to review the US oil policy.

Together these investigations have brought forth a caricature of a monopolistic, profit-grabbing industry that oilmen would rather had not seen light.

Since the same companies that dominate the US market also own the Canadian one, and tactics and policies are virtually indistinguishable, that picture has strong parallels with our own. America discovered that Middle East oil could be purchased on the East Coast of the US for only $2 a barrel, with transportation costs included. This compares to domestic oil at $3.50 a barrel or more. Ironically enough, foreign nations are able to buy oil far more cheaply than American consumers, sometimes from the same US companies.

The added cost to domestic purchasers under the import scheme was variously estimated at from $2.7 billion to $7.2 billion per year. The task force on oil policy placed the tab at $5 billion annually.

What this means, as the Subcommittee's chief economist Dr. John Blair pointed out, is that the oil-import program coupled with the domestic pro-rationing system has cost America $40 to $70 billion in overcharges in the quota system was established.

A treasury study in 1969 showed 27.5 per cent depletion tax the right to claim intangible "penses" save the US oil industry in federal taxes.

The depletion allowance encourages domestic exploitation, applicable not only to operations as well. Further credit tax credit allows oil companies paid overseas not from taxes payable on overseas production.

As a result, estimated since 1969 oil refineries average federal tax on their earnings, turning firms averaged nearly

In 1969, Gulf Oil paid less than federal taxes and Standard paid less than 10 per cent of come to the Federal Treasury.

All these revelations and pressures have made it difficult and President Nixon not to of the demands of the consumers they have leaned on the national security interests of the country protect its high concessions and protection.

The US oil interests have desperately looking for an ally one which will not fund a privileged position.

And as the crisis deepens that US oil resources may be, their search becomes government in their search for solutions.

Obviously the discovery of oil reserves in Alaska two weeks later was a lucky reprieve. But that only postpones the problem—current estimates of the Alaska reserves are 10 million barrels in the Prudhoe pools, and that would only be about two year's supply for the US.

The Canadian National Energy Board estimated in a recent study that the US would have, by 1975, an oil deficiency of .6 to 1.8 million barrels a day - this is even calculating the Alaska reserves. However, in 1990, this deficiency will have increased from 7.4 to 9.5 million barrels per day. So in the short run, until 1975 and perhaps 1980, the demand for oil will not be overwhelming. The US can get along with its own, Canadian, and some overseas imports, especially if they succeed in finding some more domestic supplies.

But by 1990 those deficiencies will be so monumental, Canada could not even supply the deficiencies herself.

And so the US government is engaged in the building of a restructured world energy policy, balancing political and economic and military considerations to ensure a secure future supply of energy.

Of that world energy policy, the continental energy scheme with Canada is only a part.

The mechanism that will make us a link in that policy, the moves of the oil Majors in concert with the US and Canadian governments, are already well advanced.

-Step one to the solution of the US oil industry's woes is exploitation of Alaskan oil, step two is a continental energy policy with Canada.

In late March of 1969, while Canada's Prime Minister was paying his first official visit to the US capital, a high level committee, comprising some of the most important members of the Nixon cabinet, was established to study the reform of the crumbling national oil policy. Part of its task was to find some answers to the looming depletion of US resources.

The calibre of the men assigned to this task force reflected the concern of the Nixon Administration: Shultz, the Secretary of Labor who chaired the committee and whence the report got its name; Rogers, Secretary of State; Kennedy, Secretary of the Treasury; Laird, Secretary of Defense; Hickel, Secretary of the Interior; Stans, Secretary of Commerce; and Lincoln, Director of the Office of Emergency Preparedness.

The Shultz committee released 393 pages of texts, diagrams and statistics in a cold, calculated look at import policies and alternative sources of supply, and weighed them all in terms of the national interests and security in the United States.

The committee split essentially over replacing the present system with tariffs or keeping the present system of quotas with minor changes. The majority of the committee chose the first alternative, a minority composed of Hickel and Stans chose the latter.

But both sides basically agreed on one thing - that the needs and security of the United States required the negotiation of a continental energy policy with Canada as soon as possible, as an important supplemental source of supply for the United States.

Quite clearly the US sees political factors and trade relations closely interlocking. The Americans are likewise clear in their own minds that there is going to have to be a further political Integration involved in increased imports of Canadian oil, rather than a simple technical and economic change.

The majority report states: "In our judgment, Canadian and Mexican oil is nearly as secure militarily as our own, although complete realization of these security benefits will require fully understood and harmonized energy policies."

It will require more than that. It will require Ottawa agreeing to place the needs of the United States over the needs of Eastern Canada in any petroleum supply emergency.

The minority reports states: "Canada is generally considered to be a secure source of oil for the United States in an emergency, except to the extent that eastern provinces are dependent on eastern hemisphere oil."

And Greene is promising the Americans that if the Middle East blockades North America, Canada will bind itself to provide its oil to the American market, even though that blockade would mean all Quebec and Maritime industry stagnating for lack of the same Middle Eastern oil.

The criteria by which the US chooses to offer its matrimonial bonds to us are never stated more clearly than in these two quotes from the Shultz report:

"The pre-eminent position of the United States in the world depends in large part on the uninterrupted flow of oil and its products to its armed forces and civilian economy."

And it proceeds to note the contingencies: "We begin by noting the major difficulties that might attend dependence on foreign supplies:

- 1) War might possibly increase our petroleum requirements beyond the ability or willingness of foreign resources to supply us.
- 2) In a prolonged conventional war the enemy might sink the tankers needed to import oil or to carry it to market from domestic production sources such as Alaska.
- 3) Local or regional revolution, hostility or guerrilla activities might physically interrupt foreign production or transportation.
- 4) Exporting countries may be taken over by radical governments unwilling to do business with our allies.
- 5) Communist countries might induce export countries to deny their oil to the West.
- 6) A group of exporting countries might act in concert to deny their oil to us, as occurred briefly in the wake of the 1967 Arab-Israeli War.
- 7) Exporting countries might take over the assets of American or European companies.
- 8) Exporting countries might form an effective cartel raising oil prices substantially."

And so the Shultz report outlines the probable guaranteed sources of supply and urges the administration to lock them into energy satellite status:

"The United States should work diligently with Canada to reach a continental energy policy that assures our mutual security. Such a policy should cover energy broadly, and should deal with not only oil but natural gas, coal and hydro-electric and nuclear sources. Pending agreement on such a policy, which may take several years to negotiate, Canada and the United States should develop an effective mechanism to permit an orderly growth of imports of oil and natural gas from Canada."

VII. 'Advance with trumpets...

The fundamental choices were made years ago, when we geared our resource policy to the United States' needs, when we set no national goals on energy exploitation; and even much farther back, when we decided it didn't matter where it all went, Wall Street or Bay Street.

We have been locked into American market and security requirements throughout our entire history as a major exporter.

Canada's first mass oil export was born of California's energy shortage in the time of the Korean War. The basis of the co-operation was, from the beginning, not economics, but political and military security. The initiative was American, not Canadian.

The United States Petroleum Administration for Defense decided in 1951 that California needed more oil, the west's traditional oil shortage having been aggravated by the war. A safe source of oil was required; for strategic reasons Canada was chosen to be the supplier.

A pipeline from Alberta to California was constructed, and a $65 million tab was picked up mostly by the major American oil companies.

The framework for this first exercise in continental energy planning had been set out in a joint agreement in 1950, which in effect established a sort of economic NATO or NORAD for scarce resources in time of emergency. It gives us a view of what a continental energy policy would be. That agreement declared that the two governments agree to "co-operate in all respects practicable... to the end that the economic efforts of the two countries be co-ordinated for the common defense, and that the production and resources of the two countries be used for the best combined results..."

What the US wants now is a more explicit agreement making an integrated economic market in resources permanent.

Canada decided in its oil policy of the early 1960's not to form its own national goals and markets but to be a supplemental supplier to the more lucrative US markets.

The interim compromise of the early 1960's saw Canada split into two markets along the Ottawa Valley — Alberta produced for the US, while the East was left to foreign imports. It's that compromise that is now cracking under the weight of the international shifts in the market, and the tensions within the US.

Canada did not opt then for a national energy system because of the very structure and development of the oil industry in this country.

Seventy-four per cent of Canada's petroleum and natural gas industry is foreign owned. Of that, 54 per cent is American, but actually 62 per cent of the industry is under American control.

Percentages are only half the picture. Concentration of ownership is equally important.

A 1964 study showed that petroleum and coal products in Canada created $2,460 million in sales.

Ninety-nine per cent of these sales were made by the 20 largest firms.

Of these 20 firms, 18 are foreign-controlled. Since Alberta, in 1968, produced 68 per cent of the total Canadian output of crude oil (Saskatchewan produced 24 per cent), we are basically speaking of Alberta oil. Almost half of Alberta's annual provincial income stems directly from the oil industry.

Canadian oil is too expensive to sell abroad — almost three times more expensive than Middle East oil. So we have a commodity that is unmarketable overseas. But we allowed it to be developed and a sector of our economy and country to become dependent on it.

If our American markets are lost, a massive recession will hit the West. Our economy is, then, controlled by the economic vicissitudes and political decisions of a foreign country.

The American offer today is a simple exchange — yield what political control you have over your energy production, provide for our needs, and reap the economic benefits. Don't, and reap the economic consequences.

It is uneconomic for Canada to have become the ninth largest oil producer in the world. Our oil is only marketable in one market, because of the high fixed and controlled prices.

All these decisions have been made for us — by the US oil companies that determined we shall become a major oil producer; by the US oil companies that control the continental price structure we are locked into; and by the US government that has carte-blanche to blackmail us by simply not buying.

If this is not a continental energy system, then it's the next best thing.

That system is speedily disintegrating, causing massive pressure on the Canadian oil industry.

Canadian producers are getting steadily frozen out of the American market because of such developments as Alaska oil finds, and the building of a pipeline to Illinois that speeds Texas oil to the Northeastern US industries.

The Ottawa Valley line has already begun to crumble, and the big Ontario market has begun to fail to foreign oil. Golden Eagle (Canada) Ltd., Petrofina (Canada) Ltd., Newfoundland Refining Co. Ltd., Gulf Oil (Canada) Ltd., all announced refinery building programs, signalling an impending influx of foreign oil.

In the short run, the US can dry up the Canadian oil industry without suffering any setbacks. But in the longer run, we will be a crucial supplementary source of supply. The long-run thirst that will develop in the US explains Washington's pushing for the continental policy. The short run security of the US market is the club with which it can clout us into that continental scheme.

And these are the choices we have allowed ourselves to be faced with:

- agree to a continental energy scheme and pay the political price of taking a giant step towards further economic and political domination by the United States.

- face the fact that our oil is uneconomic and get out of the oil business, causing a massive recession in the West.

- or make the decision we refused to make over ten years ago (under pressure from the US Majors) and build the Alberta to Montreal pipeline.

The last choice may end up being the least of three evils, but it's no easy way out.

It would mean that we would make ourselves a self-contained market, consuming in the East the surplus that is produced in the West. And we would have to pay the price in dollars, because that oil will be even more expensive in the East than current price levels on the imported oil. We would, in effect, be publicly subsidizing an industry that has grown out of proportion to our national needs — paying the price of the decisions of the US oil companies.

Strangely, this solution has been ignored by those most concerned with Canadian control of our economy. Although New Democrat Frank Auf der Maur campaigned in 1965 and 1968 almost solely on this platform, his party paid no attention. Within a system that allows the basic political and economic decisions to be made by people other than those affected by them, it is the only choice that preserves a modicum of national independence.

Parking becomes not just an internal matter

Simcoe Hall has turned on its heel and is sending its parking policy to the Governing Council's external affairs committee tomorrow afternoon in what amounts to an admission that groups outside U of T have an interest in U of T's parking policy.

The addition to external affairs' agenda was released Monday following earlier statements by Ward 9 Alderman Dorothy Thomas criticising the university's lack of responsiveness to city council's desires to reduce downtown traffic.

Thomas said yesterday she still plans to bring up U of T's parking policy at Monday's public works committee meeting at city hall, but she said she hoped she would be able to get to tomorrow's external affairs meeting.

During the last few months a tentative parking policy for U of T has been hammered out by the internal affairs and business affairs committees.

Simcoe Hall officials, including internal vice-president Jill Conway, have said the policy was created and dealt with mainly as an internal matter not needing the direct input from groups outside the university.

However, since last fall, U of T has been under fire from city hall for its lack of responsiveness to the city's desire to cut downtown traffic.

The tentative parking policy going before external affairs tomorrow calls for the construction of parking structures, improved public transit, parking fees on a break-even basis and further study into university parking needs.

External affairs is the only committee of Governing Council empowered to deal with the objections city hall has with U of T's parking policy.

Alderman Colin Vaughan opened up on university parking policy in November during a city-university liaison committee meeting telling university president John Evans U of T should set a leadership role in restricting downtown traffic by reducing university parking.

Thomas picked up the theme last month, and, claiming she had a majority of council behind her, announced she was taking the U of T parking policy to the public works committee, of which she is chairwoman, next week.

Thomas said if U of T would not co-operate with the city she would ask council to approach Metro and the province to give the city the legal authority to force U of T to co-operate.

Council's concern with U of T's parking policy began with a report last year by city works commissioner Ray Bremner, who said U of T, the provincial government and Ontario Hydro are "a major cause of our present traffic difficulties."

U of T wants more of this type of thing, but the city objects.

Thousands of Chileans want to enter Canada

In a federal department noted for its quick turn-arounds in policy, Canada's federal immigration officials are now reporting as many as 1,000 applicants per day in Chile wanting to come to Canada.

Last October, deputy assistant minister Gene Edmunds told reporters there was "no demand" by Chileans to come to Canada after the September 11 coup which ousted the government of the late president, Salvador Allende.

Yesterday, an immigration spokesman reported Edmunds was saying actually there was a demand, but it began in late December.

Edmunds said the change reflected Canada's policy of helping pay the way of refugees from Chile.

However, just after the coup, eyewitnesses from Santiago reported the doors to the Canadian embassy bolted and locked shut, and only persons with Canadian passports were allowed to enter.

Only after massive political pressure on the department in Ottawa was this policy changed and immigration officers flown into the embassy.

The number of applicants has created what one Ottawa spokesman termed an "administrative crisis." The crush of applicants has actually damaged one of the elevators leading to the embassy's 11th floor offices.

There are two kinds of applicants immigration officers are dealing with, and in two different kind of manners.

Non-Chilean citizens are being processed as refugees, who are governed by a different set of rules for admission to Canada than are applicants for landed immigrant status.

Chilean citizens are being processed as standard applications for landed immigrant status.

The difference in admission criteria is marked.

Landed immigrant applicants must take the standard route, of obtaining 50 out of 100 assessment points. The point system is weighted to give those with high education and or high job skills the easiest admission to Canada.

In addition the applicant must pass a routine medical check and a security check, which entails finding out if the applicant is an advocate of violent revolution as defined by the immigration department.

Non-Chileans apply as refugees. But they are only admitted provided they can establish they have reasonable grounds to believe they would be persecuted for their religious or political beliefs or racial background.

Refugees are not subject to the point system, but they are subject to the medical and security checks.

Only non-Chileans, or refugees, have received any government aid to come to Canada. Chileans must pay their own way.

Injunction ruling later this week

A court ruling on whether a lead company can successfully censor a Canadian Broadcasting Corporation broadcast on lead pollution may be handed down by Friday.

Mr. Justice Richard Holland reserved judgement Monday on motions and counter-motions stemming from the efforts of Canada Metals Co. Ltd. to have a temporary injunction made permanent forbidding the CBC from broadcasting sections of a documentary about the lead firm.

CBC has argued for the quashing of the injunction which resulted in the deletion of certain sections of a January 29 broadcast of the documentary, Dying of Lead, on the radio show, As It Happens.

The CBC claims the injunction prohibits broadcast of points not even alleged or implied in the program and that previous court rulings say injunctions ought not to be given if they impinge unnecessarily on freedom of speech.

The case represents one of the rare cases of prior restraint in Canadian history, a situation where someone censors the press prior to the publication or broadcast of the material.

The case has developed, actually, into two cases.

The second case involves a move by Canada Metals to jail five executives and reporters of the Globe and Mail and CBC plus Canadian Liberation Movement chairman Gary Perly.

That second case stems from the company's allegation that despite the January 29 ex parte injunction, which still remains in force, the Globe, CBC and CLM published or broadcast prohibited material.

The second case has been remanded until February 22, at which time the decision on the first case should have been handed down.

Anatomy of a Root

Fine Canadian Leathers
The soft skins are naturally finished, so in Roots you'll look as good as you feel. And because Roots are designed and made right here in Canada, you needn't pay through the nose for your feet.

Rocker Sole
In a natural stride, weight moves from the heel, along the outer side of the foot then diagonally across to the big toe, which springs you off on your next step. Roots rocker sole helps this shift in weight, making every foot-step just a little less tiring.

1052 Yonge Street
(Opposite Rosedale Subway Station)

Supported Arch
The city sidewalk can be a real arch enemy. And fallen arches hurt. Roots are contoured to support the arch and the small recess between the balls of your feet.

Recessed Heel
Walk on sand and your heel will leave the deepest part of your footprint. In natural walking, most of your weight lands on your heel. Conventional shoes—heel too low—heel too high—tilt you forward and change your basic posture. In Roots, your heel sinks into a comfortable recess, giving you a natural walk on any kind of surface.

Multinationals contribute nothing: economist

MONTREAL (CUP) — "If you don't want to be my brother, I'll bash your head in." This German proverb, says economist Paul Sweezy, describes the attitude of multinational corporations to the Third World.

Speaking to more than 500 people at a McGill University panel discussion on Jan. 31, Sweezy attacked several "myths about the altruistic nature" of multinationals. He said they conform to the fundamental tenet of the market structure—the profit motive.

Sweezy, who wrote Monopoly

Capital with Paul Baran and who is co-editor of the journal Monthly Review, added that the existing social system encourages corporations to develop to the maximum. "They have nothing to do but grow and expand."

Sweezy said "a unit of capital has an inherent tendency to expand." Nineteenth century capitalists could expand for an extended period without changing the system simply by taking over inefficient firms. But after extended expansion the capitalist unit acquired a "critical market power" which effected a radical transition from a competitive situation to one of monopoly.

"It was at this point," Sweezy said, "conglomerates and multinationals arose. General Motors, to protect its own market, invests profits into other industries and foreign markets through the establishment of subsidiaries."

Multinationals contribute nothing to the development of foreign economies, Sweezy pointed out. "They have never been known to export capital. They export trademarks, technical know-how and patents and thus subsidiary markets begin to grow. They are 'suction-pumps' draining surpluses value out of host countries."

Sweezy said multinationals are "trying to extract the greatest surplus value from workers."

He also criticized the national bourgeoisie of Third World countries for "acting as local agents of the imperialist bourgeoisie" and said successful revolution is the only solution for Third World countries.

McGill economics professor Eric Kierans also spoke at the panel discussion. He said politicians and economists "have yet to come to grips with the conception of corporations" and called for political solutions.

Kari Levitt, another McGill economist at the discussion, said the modern corporation is an example of a new mercantilism—"a throwback to an old kind of capitalist venture. It engages in production and trade and employs a private civil service and private armies."

She said, however, the "continuity" of the capitalist system "is more evident than the changes within it."

U of T's toughened-up attitude towards discipline is in evidence everywhere these days, for instance at College and St. George.

Energy crisis OK for Gulf

In what must be one of the most predictable developments of the energy crisis, Gulf Oil Canada Ltd. reported its 1973 profits were up to a record $37.3 million over the firm's 1972 profits.

The 57.9 per cent increase gave the company $101.7 million in profits on a 21.2 per cent increase of revenue.

Total revenue for 1973 barely reached the $1 billion figure, compared to $874 million in 1972.

The Gulf figures come hot on the heels of other oil industry giants who also "suffered" during the 1973 energy crisis.

Imperial Oil Ltd. was only able to muster a 45.2 per cent increase in profits to $228 million, and Shell Canada Ltd. scraped by with a 23.6 per cent increase in profits to $112.5 million.

The three big firms' combined 1973 profits, in fact, totaled $441 million in what all three termed "record years."

Gulf's return on a share of $2.23, up from $1.42 last year, was such a disappointment at a 10.1 per cent return, that the company promptly declared a dividend of 15 cents per share for the first quarter of 1974, on shares now trading at about $30 each.

Summing up the tragedy of it all, Gulf president Jerry McAfee said:

"The 10.1 per cent is much better than we have enjoyed for the past 20 years but it's still a long way from being excessive or unconscionable."

McAfee said the 1973 totals were record highs and were due to increased volume and prices.

Gulf's six refineries ran at close to capacity throughout the year, and other factors helping the profit picture included a substantial reduction in losses from petrochemical operations and an increase in investment income on a short term basis.

She referees and likes it Hart House players like her

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Third year PHE student Aggie Thueman referees men's intramural basketball at Hart House. She just happens to be a woman, but that doesn't seem to bother anyone, least of all her.

"No, I don't think it makes that much difference that I'm a woman," Thueman said. "Refereeing basketball is always difficult, but my being a woman doesn't make it any more difficult. As long as you're a good referee nobody complains."

We idly wondered whether the players behaved any differently around her than they would around a male referee. For example, did they swear less?

"Men don't swear any more than women do during a game," said Thueman. "When players swear, it isn't specifically directed at you, anyway. It's more a function of the game."

"I've played basketball myself, so it doesn't bother me. And I've never given a technical foul for it either. 'I've had a lot of compliments by the same people who swore at me during the game," said Thueman.

Management Studies was playing SMC B that day, with Thueman acting as one of the referees. We asked players for both sides "What do you feel about having a female referee?"

All the players asked didn't care one way or the other and all said she was one of the finest referees they had had during the year.

One player from Mgt Studies said "Do I care whether she's a woman? Shit, no. We had that broad back in the fall and she was good. It's too bad all the men referees weren't that good."

Gymnasts take team title

By BRYAN ALCOCK

Hans Frick won four events and shared first place in two others as he led the men's gymnastics team to the team title in the OUAA western section championships held at Western on Saturday.

Frick, who coaches as well as competes, took top honors in the free exercise, side horse parallel bars, and high bar and tied with teammate Rick Jeysmen for first place in vaulting and with teammate John Fair in rings.

Five of Toronto's gymnasts placed first to fifth in all around competition. Frick was first with 47.50, Peter Mazaro second with 39.85, John Fair third with 37.75, Rick Jeysmen fourth with 36.30, and Brian Euler fifth with 36.10. John Kelly of Toronto was eighth with 30.40.

This earned the team first place with a score of 198.65 points (team scores consist of the top five marks on all six pieces of apparatus).

Only two other universities were represented—both fielding partial teams. McMaster was solidly in second place with 119.35 and Western's "two-man team" third.

The top two teams plus the top six all around finishers qualify for the finals where they meet the winners from the eastern section. This will place Toronto against York for first place and the right to advance to the CIAU championships. McMaster will meet RMC (probably) for third and fourth. The finals will be on February 23 at York's Tait McKenzie Building.

Blues defeat York

By PAUL CARSON

The hockey Blues scored four powerplay goals to defeat York Yeomen 5-3 at the York Arena last night.

The victory, Blues' sixteenth this season and thirty-seventh consecutive OUAA game without a loss, virtually clinches first place in the eastern division. Blues now lead York by five points with three games remaining.

Rookie right-winger Doug Herridge broke a three-all tie at 14:27 of the final period when he beat York netminder Art Willer with a perfect shot from the left face-off circle.

Two minutes later Willer surrendered a soft rebound to Larry Hopkins who promptly rapped it in for the insurance goal.

Herridge and yet another Varsity rookie, Ron Harris, combined for the other two powerplay goals in the second period.

They were carbon-copy passing plays as first Harris and then Herridge fired quick shots past Miller following rink-wide set-up passes. Bill Fifield scored Varsity's other goal on a Gord Davies rebound in the first period.

The power-play outburst was somewhat ironic since Blues failed to score on a two man advantage for a full two minutes early in the game. The Yeomen had rallied from a 3-1 deficit with two power-play goals of their own 48 seconds apart in third period.

Paul Cerie and Peter Titanic fired rebounds past Jim Cambell as Blues took four consecutive penalties. Defenceman John Marshall scored York's other goal on a screened shot in the first period.

Blues outshot the Yeomen 54-31 and York took 12 of 23 minor penalties including four in a row late in the game. Blues converted two of them into the decisive goals.

Varsity defenceman Rick Cornacchia and York's Al Avery engaged in a spirited fight in the third period and both players received game misconducts.

A capacity crowd of over 1500 well-lubricated York fans witnessed the game and frequently showed their displeasure at the somewhat inconsistent officiating by littering the ice with their empty beer cans.

Blues can officially sew up first place by defeating Ottawa Gee-Gees Friday night at the Arena.

Directorate releases budget figures

By CHRIS ROBINSON
Budget figures released at the U of T men's Athletic Association Directorate meeting Tuesday paint a gloomy financial picture.

The report prepared and introduced by assistant director (administration) Dave Tinker showed an expected deficit of $22,500 for the year ending April 30, 1974.

The 1974-75 budgeted deficit is $58,000.

In recent years the UTAA has usually managed to produce small surpluses—last year's was $9,700. This year, rapidly increasing expenditures and a failure of certain expected revenues to materialize forced Tinker to present his first red ink budget.

The budgets for 1973-74 and 1974-75 vary little from the actual 1972-73 results.

The largest item of revenue is still student fees at $270,000, or 60 per cent of the total of $426,000.

Only seven of the 19 members of the directorate are students.

Intercollegiate games provide about five per cent with $24,000. Stadium rentals are the major area of decline, down to $35,000 or eight per cent from $55,000 last year.

Rental of the arena was steady at $60,000 but both it and the stadium had been expected to produce much more.

The failure of professional football and the death of pro lacrosse were given as the main reasons.

Also, in the past Encore Productions has given several concerts in the stadium, but has so far shown no interest for the coming summer.

Food service, laundry and sundry provided the remaining $37,000 which was not expected to change much in the future.

The laundry is deceptive since it is balanced by equal expenditures.

Expenditures showed a modest increase from $502,000 expected this year to $514,000 next year. Most of this appeared in greater grants to the athletic clubs sponsoring intercollegiate teams.

Total grants of $125,000 were gobbled up by 22 sports, the athletic awards and the dinner.

The big three still grabbed the lion's share in spite of slight decreases: football $35,000, 27 per cent; hockey $28,000, 22 per cent; basketball $10,000, 12 per cent.

In fact, together they accounted for 12 per cent of all UTAA expenditures.

The other large items of expense included the arena at $127,000, the stadium at $88,000, salaries at $69,000 and gym and locker room at $30,000.

One other loss is the annual rebate from the school of PHE and the department of athletics and recreation.

Budget cuts in these areas reduced their payment to the UTAA to $38,500 from $44,500.

New College principal Don Ivey expressed the major concern of the committee when faced with this budget. Ivey inquired about the possibility of reducing the allotments to the athletic clubs.

Since most of the salaries and maintenance costs are fixed, this area presented the only possibility for saving.

In addition, he questioned the high level of support maintained for the big sports, even though they are reducing their costs.

Law professor R.C. Risk pointed out Tinker had said revenues for attendance at intercollegiate games was declining.

There had been a time when such teams had paid for themselves, and he wondered whether the UTAA was financing a spectacle that the students no longer wanted.

Ivey pointed out he had supported the budget in the executive committee meeting, but suggested that perhaps the directorate should ask Tinker to consider the possibility of cutting all budgets to force teams to control their spending in a way they might not now.

Graduate member N.H. McLelland suggested Tinker was being very much the cautious accountant and the figures were not as bad as he was actually suggesting.

Tinker replied the budget contained the factual data available to him at that time and he would stick to it.

Tinker was asked how the deficit would be financed.

He noted that the UTAA has an accumulated surplus of $109,000.

If the expected deficits materialize, this would be reduced to $29,000.

Subsequent losses would force either a fee increase or a plea to the university.

Ivey moved the adoption of the budget seconded by Risk. The vote was unanimously in favor without any changes, although most members had expressed strong worries.

Most of the expenditures by the UTAA are fixed in the sense they cannot be reduced appreciably without a great decrease in services.

Unless the gate receipts for games or the revenue from rentals show a large increase, an athletic fee increase for 1975-76 is a distinct possibility.

Value has its own tasty rewards...

Women's ice hockey

In interfac ice hockey, the PHE women defeated Meds by a resounding 5-0. Mac Donald put in the first goal, soon followed by Bennett, Porter and Langs.

Vic B and Trinity tied their game 2-2. Sellers made both the Trinity points. Howey and Aachmatowicz scored for Vic.

McLellan scored half of SMC's 4-0 victory over Vic. Other SMC scorers were Murphy and O'Hara.

The game between Pots II and Trin-II was declared a double default.

FACULTY OF ARTS AND SCIENCE COUNCIL AND COMMITTEES ANNOUNCEMENT OF ELECTION

One half of the elected membership of the Council and its Committees retires each year, to be replaced by elected members who will be elected for two years. The following summary relates particularly to the responsibilities of the elected student and faculty members of Council and the function and role of the Committees on which they will serve.

The major committee in the structure is the General Committee which has 49 elected students, 91 elected faculty and 59 ex-officio members such as College Heads, Department Chairmen and representatives of other Faculties. The General Committee is responsible for the formulation of policy for the Faculty of Arts and Science. It is concerned, for example, with curriculum development, admissions policy, study abroad programmes, and evaluation policy, and determines the regulations governing the length of the academic session and day. It also serves as a forum for discussion of any matters of general concern to the Faculty, from which resolutions may be sent to other bodies, including the Governing Council of the University. Some student members of the General Committee are elected directly to it (2 from each College and 3 part-time students, giving a total of 17). The remainder assume their seats automatically upon election to one of the five Curriculum Committees; or the Committee on Counselling, or Study Elsewhere. Membership on all Committees is normally for a two-year renewable term.

There are five curriculum committees: Humanities, Social Sciences, Physical Sciences, Life Sciences and Interdisciplinary Studies, the last of which is also responsible for various special courses in the Faculty. Each committee is chaired by an Associate Dean and has 3 full-time students, 1 part-time student, and 6 faculty members. These committees review all course proposals submitted by Departments for inclusion in the Calendar, and may take initiative in proposing development of new areas of study and any other matters pertaining to the course offerings.

The Counselling Committee has 1 student member from each College, 1 part-time student, and 4 faculty members. The Chairman will be appointed from among the members. This committee is responsible for co-ordination of counselling for undergraduates in Arts and Science and for secondary school students interested in eventually entering the Faculty. While many individuals and offices on the campus are involved in counselling of one kind, or another, students all too often do not receive the information and advice which they need at critical points during their years at the University.

The Committee on Study Elsewhere supervises the arrangements through which students in the Faculty may spend a year abroad to facilitate their studies in certain disciplines. It will have four full-time student and four faculty members. The Chairman will be appointed from among the members.

In addition there is an Academic Standards Committee, a Committee on Standing, and an Admissions Committee. Appointed faculty and ex-officio persons will sit on these committees.

A list of positions that are open has been published in the University media and is available at the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall, College and Departmental offices and the APUS office. In addition, a complete description of the structure of the Council and the accompanying rules of procedure may be obtained on request from the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall.

NOMINATIONS OPENED FEBRUARY 4

Full-time and part-time students registered in the Faculty of Arts and Science are eligible for nomination to the following committees: General Committee, Committee on Study Elsewhere, Counselling Committee, Curriculum Committee on Humanities, Curriculum Committee on Interdisciplinary Studies, Curriculum Committee on Life Sciences, Curriculum Committee on Physical Sciences, Curriculum Committee on Social Sciences. For nomination to a curriculum committee, other than Interdisciplinary Studies, a full-time student must be intending to take at least three courses within the group in the next academic year.

Nominations opened on February 4. Nomination forms may then be obtained at the Faculty Office, College Registrar's offices or Departmental offices, and the APUS office. Completed nomination forms must be returned to the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall prior to 4.00 p.m. February 15th to be valid. Voting will be by ballot box. Enquiries regarding this election may be directed to 928-3389 or 928-3392.

By BOB BETTISON
HART HOUSE (Special to the Varsity) — This basketball court was again the scene of almost unrivalled carnage as Strachan's Folly bowed to Eng V 51-12 in an intermediate basketball game last Friday.

Strachan's Folly did not quite meet the high standards they set a few weeks ago in their 63-0 defeat by Vic III. Unfortunately, a serious error cost Strachan's Folly another chance at a perfect game as George Ferguson inadvertently netted a shot early in the game.

This might have broken a lesser team but not Strachan's Folly. They obviously wanted to make a fight of it anyway.

Five-foot two-inch centre Tom Hurka stuffed two shots while sitting on Ferguson's shoulders as the high spirited Follies soared to a bigger deficit later in the game.

Earlier, however, they had actually narrowed the score to 14-8 after some nifty shooting by Ferguson but the Follies retreated into their usual style, getting into foul trouble and turning over the ball frequently.

A new wrinkle was added by the infamous "E for Elmo" play in which one player got on all fours, another player knelt in front of him and one more player stood in front of both of them, to form a human ramp. Then another Strachan's Folly player took a pass, ran up the ramp of bodies and neatly dropped it through the hoop.

On one foul shot the ball was tossed up to the upstairs track where a waiting Follies player dropped the ball in the net.

The Follies added some talent by importing some women from the St. Hilda's Hookers. They came out in the warm-up to the strains of "2001 Space Doodley" and performed a pantomime lay-up drill without the encumbrance of basketballs. Unfortunately, the use of women caused an automatic default of the game by the Follies.

The leading Engineer scorers were Kirk (25), Cole (14), Tavoros (7), Gregoris (4) and Frustaglia (1).

Ferguson topped all Trin scorers with four points. Milne, Poulos and De Wolf each blasted two points. Snidman Johanna Kidd also scored a basket for Strachan's Folly.

A crowd of over seventy watched the game, including Miss Boyd, who made the famous "fools rush in where angels fear to tread" remark after the 63-0 debacle. She stubbornly refused to retract it after seeing the antics of this classic match.

Volleyball Blues defeat York, Laurentian, Carleton, Queen's

By PAT DARTFORD

After failing to win the second Challenge Cup at York, the U of T volleyball Blues travelled to the nation's capital last weekend and dominated play in the eastern sectionals. Aside from a slow start, the big Blue machine was in high gear throughout Saturday's action.

They began the morning, playing Laurentian, and after Shaughn Renahan has successfully served 11 consecutive points, the contest was already decided. Final scores were 15-11, 15-1.

In the next encounter, the Blues met their weakest rivals, host university Carleton. Again consistent serving led the way as Heli Kaur placed 10 consecutive points on the scoreboard. Toronto finished off Carleton with 15-0, 15-5 victories.

The afternoon session began with the York match, and Toronto handed their local neighbours 15-0, 15-4 losses. Throughout the competition, coach Marj Shedd varied the Blues' attack plan, utilizing the consistent setting of Shaughn Renahan and Marion Thomson, coupled with the power hitting of Frances Walmsley and Judie Trevelyan.

When the Blues were called into defensive action, Mary Drakich, and Irene Hammerich patrolled the net to block any opponent's spiking efforts. Peggy Duif and Heli Kaur used their quick reaction talents to dig out any tipping attempts, and Jane Nixon and Valerie Long's versatile play helped continue the Blues' winning ways.

Following the York contest, Toronto took to the court against Queen's. The team responded with a quick pair of 15-2, 15-5 wins, then awaited the final Ottawa showdown. The spirited Ottawa team couldn't penetrate the Blue defense while U of T put spikes and tips out of Ottawa's reach. The final scores of 15-7, 15-4 climaxed a very satisfying weekend.

Out of the eastern section, Toronto, Ottawa, and Laurentian qualified to meet Western, Waterloo, and McMaster for the OWIAA championship in two weeks.

In a dual wrestling meet held over the weekend, the Toronto wrestlers were soundly defeated by the Guelph contingent, in a final score of 33-7.

Rob Morre (134 lbs), Steve Tisberger (142 lbs), Walter Crinjan (167 lbs) and John McConnell (177 lbs) were all missing from the meet, which should explain Toronto's poor showing.

Len Gang (118 lbs) was pinned by Al Tschirhart. Peter Matthews was pinned by Dan Mitchell in the 150 pound class, Rick Smith a Guelph Wrestler, decided Hugh Preston (158 lbs) in a score of 4-3.

The brothers Preobrazenski and George Multimaki were Toronto's shining lights. Multimaki decided John Simpson 4-3 Jack Preobrazenski (177 lbs) tied 4-4 with Ross Baraballo, while Roman defeated Paul Simpson (HVV) by a commendable 5-1.

The U of T cross-country ski team competed in the southern Ontario ski zone championships at Mansfield on the weekend. In the Senior Men's "A" 15 kilometer race Doug Garfield placed fourth with a time of 52:56. He might well have placed higher if it were not for a collision with an over-hanging tree branch which nearly knocked him out leaving him with severe cuts about the eyes and nose.

Other racers for the Blues included Dag Furst (8th, 58:52), Ken Sidney (9th, 59:24), Rich Sutcliffe (10th, 59:31), Tom Best (15th, 53:23) and Dave McClyment (16th, 65:37).

On Sunday the relay team of Alan Van Geijn (3 9:03), Dag Furst (36:52), and Doug Garfield (34:29) placed second in the 3x10 kilometer relay.

Fac b'ball and v'ball results

By BOB PRITCHARD

Interfac basketball

In interfac basketball, as of last Wednesday, Med A scooted up to a second place tie with Vic I in the IA division, thanks to four straight wins. SGS was the first victim of the Doctors, losing 80-72. Field "fired" 27 points for the Grads, while Marocis contributed 20. Horenbas and Hibloos hocked 16 each for the Meds.

The next team to be operated on was Sr Eng, who bowed 71-62. Hibloos managed 22 on his own in that bout. Third in line was Scar, who lumbled 80-57. Sherkin added his 17 points worth in that one. UC I continued the pattern, dropping a 68-52 decision. Horenbas notched 16 more that time.

SMC remained (ho hum) undefeated, knocking off three wins of their own. They dribbled over PHE B 106-78. For SMC, Campana had 19, while Trafford added 16. Hawkins and Snell put in more than respectful performances with 23 and 22 point totals for the Jocks.

In their next outing, the men in blue stuffed Law I 87-52. Campana only earned 17 in that contest, but Dziemianczuk helped with 20. Trafford chimed in for 14 points to lead his team in their 86-76 defeat of UC I. Horak replied with 19 for the losers.

Vic I held on to its second place tie with a 71-62 win over Phe A, and 76-68 decision over UC I. In the latter game Kastelic hit for 20 points, while Eben accounted for 19.

Against SGS, Vic became the "Victims" of a 70-60 loss. Johnston put 28 of the Grads points on the scoreboard, while Ames' aim was good enough for 17. SGS went on to take PHE A 68-52 relying on 29 points from their old standby Fjeld.

Sr Eng took away a 69-64 victory from UC I with Tallon tallying 16 points. Horak led the losers with 22. They went on to shame New A (if they have any shame left) 106-72.

Poor old Wolski kept his team in the game scoring half their points, while Mendelsohn showed some moral support with 21. On the other side, six of the Skulemen ended up in double figures, led by Gratz's 20.

In the continuing story of New A's bad Gnus, they lost 71-62 to PHE A.

Maydo rubbed it in with 18 points.

Trin A took over the NC assault with an 86-65 win, while Ernst earned 21 and Wright 18 for Trin. Once again, Wolski's and Mendelsohn's 40 point combination went to waste. In the game against Law, the Gnus cleverly used a new strategy; they didn't bother to show up.

In other division I action, Scar got 18 points from Snider and 17 from Lichtfuss to bounce Law I 76-65. Pirie had 19 for the Lawyers.

UC I, with 16, 17 and 18 points from Germain, Horak and Carr respectively, beat SGS 80-74. Johnston lodged 18 for the Grads. Law I came back to defeat Trin A 75-58, thanks to Halfnight's 23 points. Foster fostered 25 for Trin.

In the A part of the second division, Phe C remained in the top spot with little difficulty. They trounced UC II 54-22, then put away St. M. B 50-30.

Visca led the Jocks' cause with 16 points. Jr Eng felled For A from the second place spot with a 48-37 win over Dent A, and then a 39-33 cutting of the Lumbermen.

Harris led the Engineers with 12, while Clark was the top Tree with 15. For A earlier nipped Mgt Stud in a 51-50 squeaker.

In another game, Tonison's 12 points helped Dent A bite into a 50-48 chomping of Mgt Stud. Skeleton boned up 12 points for the losers.

Meanwhile, in the II B division, the top four teams are within two points of each other. Trin B took two wins, 40-17, over New B and 47-26 over Phe D.

Tied with them is Pharm, who after losing a 49-48 hairline battle with Innis, came back to dispense of Med B 47-30. D'Angelo led the Pharmacists with 20 points.

Two points ahead in the standings are Innis and Dent B. The Dentists choked in an upset victory by Med B (who were led by Ralston's 15 points), but handled Innis easily 46-29.

Hornis led the tooth pullers with 12. Law II recorded two consecutive wins, 43-32 over Phe D, and 36-34 over New B. Spiegel catalogued 13 for Law in the latter match.

And yes, believe it or not, the Beta boys of the New Gnus attained a spot on the standings scoreboard when they held Phe D to a 30-30 tie.

(Remember, you read it here first!)

Interfac volleyball

In Division I, Eng I (last year's defending champs) and Erin I will meet for the right to take on Scar for the championship.

Eng I advanced by defeating Eng II 15-10, 3-15 and 15-1, then taking Knox 15-5, 13-15 and 15-8. Erin I defeated Phe 15-11, 4-15 and 15-5.

Scar has played both teams previously in the double elimination tournament. They spiked the Engineers in two games, 17-15 and 15-6, but had a little more trouble with the west end boys, requiring three games (15-11, 4-15 and 15-5). The Eng/Erin game takes place Thursday at 7:00.

In Division II, SMC came back all the way to win the championship. They beat Grads 15-8, 7-15 and 15-12, going on to face New.

New had defeated SMC earlier in the tournament, but the boys in blue handed New a match defeat after losing the first of the three games. Since that was New's first loss, it forced a final game.

In that match, SMC polished off the Gnus in two straight, 15-2, and 15-7 to win the championship.

Sync or swim

The OUWAA synchronized swim competition was held in Kingston at Queen's university on Feb 8 and 9. Queen's placed first, with Toronto and McMaster tied for second and Western fourth. Ten universities were competing.

The Toronto team included Pat Comley, Kim Echlin, Mary McLaughlin, Sue McLaughlin, Laurie Rapsey, Lori McMahon, Cathy Volpe, and coach, Vicki McClements.

The Toronto team came second in the routine team competition. Pat Conley took sixth place in the solo routines. Sue McLaughlin and Laurie Rapsey, in the duet, were fourth. Mary McLaughlin and Kim Echlin came tenth out of a field of fifteen.

In the figure competitions Comley was twelfth; Sue McLaughlin, eighteenth; Echlin, twentieth.

Sport barons mistreat players and fans

New York Rangers' hockey coach Emile Francis once remarked, "The good ones in this game are real thoroughbreds. They come to play every night. Money is important but not the motivating force, the thing that separates them from the average player. My guys belong in that category. They'll give out, won't lose."

The Toronto Globe magazine interviewed Argonauts' Coach Leo Cahill. He told them that he considers the players his "friends." Until they get out of line. "Then I'll do what it takes right up to getting rid of them." Cahill talked about the thing that makes (well-socialized) professionals what they are: "That's down-in-the-dirt hard work and sweat and toughness and determination. That's the secret of their success, but some of these kids are not very smart. This is where class (?) prevails. This is when a guy understands that he is only as good as his next game and that he doesn't have many friends unless he's making a contribution."

The magazine points out that, even at gin rummy, the coach "competes fiercely," "never letting up," trying to "psyche out" his opponent, telling him he can't win - "playing to win, always to win." "I hate to lose," says the coach, "because I hate to lose. I made my mind up a long time ago that some guys are winners and some guys are losers. I'm a winner and I'm going to win..." He says "Football coaches are a special breed."

And all this is precisely the kind of elitism and hyper-competitiveness he teaches his players and fans: There are a few guys who make it to the top; they're the ones with "class"; they do it through "hard work and sweat and toughness and determination"; and they never let up because they're playing to win, win, win.

Players and fans are thus socialized for capitalist production. They are socialized to have the kind of acquisitive personalities the system demands. They are taught to want to run up their scores, to make the grade, get to the top of the heap, compete, drive, fight, fight, fight. "Hungry" players. "Money" players.

Of course, they're only supposed to compete and fight against each other, never against the management. A ballplayer - or a worker - is taught to accept (without question!) the authority of his coaches and managers. His job is just to keep fit, keep plugging, keep improving his performance, stick to it, and know his place (or plays) on the sports or company team. He's supposed to be loyal to the team. (This often means - put out for, but don't knock, the management.) If he's learned all that, he is sometimes called "a coach's dream."

A recent article in the Toronto Star about CFL pro football explained, "The players don't object to being robots, at least not openly. It wouldn't do any good anyway. (The coach's) decrees are not to be ignored. If the quarterback thinks he has a better idea, or knows a reason why the designated manoeuvre will fail, he's still wiser to do as he's told."

Dave Raimy, formerly an All-CFL back with the Winnipeg team, once remarked: "Here in Winnipeg, football players should be robots. They should do what they are told and then go home. We never have the slightest idea what our game plan is - I just go out, get in my stance, and go down the field on the first play... I think you should do what you're told to do (?), but you should also be convinced that what you're doing is right." Then he added, "Maybe I'm wrong. Maybe I am trying to be the coach."

Naturally with attitudes like that, Raimy was promptly traded. (You can't have the workers telling the manager what to do.) It happens all the time. A guy will argue a little too long over his contract or not jump fast enough when his coach barks an order, or he might commit what Jim Bouton calls the cardinal sin of questioning the coach, or he might be a black ballplayer that has white girl friends.

Before you know it, word gets around that the guy's a "troublemaker." He lacks a "big league attitude." If he's still in the league after being traded once or twice, he quickly gets the message: Play "ball" our way or get out!

Many get thrown out. And owners have their own informal blacklists for cases like this. Former National Football League players Bernie Parrish, Freeman White, Walter Beach, and Johnny Sample testified about such blacklisting before a federal grand jury. (Beach had previously made a complaint about this to the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission.) Parrish had been trying to organize a players' association.

As quarterback George Ratterman later put it, "In this league the quickest way to get a reputation as a troublemaker is to read your contract." The year before, Steve Wright, a 250-pound tackle for the New York Giants, was reportedly suspended for having an improper attitude. (The Giants' owner was well known to have a mania about clean language and church attendance. He even used to bring a priest into the locker room before every home game to lead everyone in prayers.) Just before the following season the Giants' brass dropped Wright completely. He eventually caught on with another team.

The owners have many number of tactics they can use on unruly sorts - fines, benching, suspensions, a trip to the minors, unconditional release, and, if all that fails, the blacklist. For example, when Jim Bouton refused to sign his contract with the Yankees one year, General Manager Ralph Houk threatened to fine him $100 for every day he was out of spring training, where the rule was only signed players could attend. (It reminds you of the old days at the turn of the century when it was sometimes the practice to fine unions for every day they went on strike.)

So common was the firing of NHL hockey players by their owners that even the Rea Commission on Canadian Sports took issue with such arbitrary practices. It is as if your boss could summarily fine you any time he feels like it.

In Bouton's case, after his salary squabble with the management, he was, despite his previous excellent pitching record, suddenly dropped from the starting rotation, and soon found himself in the minors. When he wrote a mildly irreverent book on baseball, he was immediately ordered into the commissioner's office. The official attitude toward what was called "knocking the game," he later recalled, was that (as the commissioner put it) if you were selling cars, you shouldn't be telling people about their lousy transmissions. And so, too, with America's National Pastime.

Another case was Jim Brosnan. In the early sixties he wrote two books (even more harmless than Bouton's) about the compositeness of certain baseball managers and the wild machinations of the front-office brass. So in 1962 he was shipped from the Cincinnati Reds to the Chicago White Sox. With the Sox he was made into a relief pitcher and had a so-so season, but with a very good - 2.84 - earned run average. He was offered a contract with a 20 per cent cut - and with the added stipulation that he do no further writing. (It was pointed out that paragraph 3 (c) of the uniform baseball contract - titled "LOYALTY" - forbids players from saying or writing anything "without written consent of the Club.") When he refused these conditions, he was put on waivers. No one picked him up.

As a general point, the technique of putting a player you want blackballed out on waivers, after first being assured by the other owners that no one will pick him up, is becoming quite a standard way to wreck a guy's career. This is what Carl Furillo, the old Dodger right fielder claims happened to him, Parrish, Beach, and Sample claim they got this treatment, too.

Then there was the story of All-NHL defenceman Doug Harvey's efforts to form a pro hockey players' association. Originally, the overt issue there - as in all other big league sports - was whether the players would get a pension fund. The owners were not enthusiastic.

"They didn't want players to get together," said Doug Harvey. "They didn't want them talking to each other." Who knows, they might have started comparing notes about salaries, working conditions; you couldn't have that. Such is the fierce level of competition inculcated in pro hockey that Harvey later admitted that, "the hardest thing I ever had to do in hockey" was associate with a member of an opposing team - in this case, discussing the pension plan with Ted Lindsay of the Detroit Red Wings. Gradually, and with incredible difficulty the players began to get their association together:

"Unfortunately, it never got off the ground and some of the leaders, including Lindsay, got themselves into a lot of trouble with management. I know that Jack Adams, the Detroit manager, was angry with Lindsay and wound up sending him to the then lowly Chicago Black Hawks as punishment. Harvey asked me to join the association...I was sure that if I did...I would have been in even more hot water, particularly with Frank Selke (the Montreal boss). He didn't want me to have any part of the union (Rocket Richard in Stan Fischler's book, The Flying Frenchmen.)

Suddenly, the axe started falling in all directions. Montreal militant Bert Olmstead was traded to Toronto, and Dollard St. Laurent went to Chicago. Later Donnie Marshall and Jacques Plante were shipped out.

At Toronto, association leader Dick Duff was sent packing, Bill Gadsby was switched from Chicago to New York, and Fern Flaman left Boston. (A similar purge of player reps occurred a couple of years ago following the baseball players' strike. Joe Torre, perhaps the top player in baseball, was shipped from Atlanta to St. Louis; Cleto Boyer ended up in the minors; and so on.)

Doug Harvey nevertheless seemed fairly secure in Montreal - after all, he was in the process of winning the Norris trophy as the league's top defenceman for the sixth time. He was team captain, had the highest seniority on the club, and the management had even asked him if he was interested in coaching. During the off season he was asked to go on tour out West to promote beer for Montreal's beer baron ownership (i.e., Molsons). When he returned he found his contract had been sold to New York.

SAC discipline referendum possible

SAC decided it may have a referendum on discipline at the same time as it holds presidential elections, March 13 and 14.

The meeting, held yesterday at Trinity college, was a non-official meeting without decision making power because of a lack of quorum. A quorum is 25 out of 60.

But straw votes were held on what to do in the continuing campaign to repeal the discipline code.

SAC president Bob Anderson told the council that negotiations now going on with the administration were not very significant so far.

He added the only proposal being studied by the administration is one by the GSU legitimizing non-violent disruptive demonstrations.

"This is not likely to be accepted," he commented. "They have a very much different position now."

SAC representative Rick Gregory attacked The Varsity for confusing the issues by calling for no negotiations and defended the SAC position saying The Varsity should be criticizing the administration not

SAC. He advocated continuing negotiations.

On the question of whether SAC would accept the academic sections of the Conway-Cadario code Anderson said.

"With modifications we would like to see it passed."

Vice-president Steve Moses said this was inconsistent "on the surface" with the 'repeal the code' position backed by the college councils and the more than 3,000 students who have signed petitions.

Anderson replied it was not inconsistent "if you realize significant modifications would make it as different from the Conway-Cadario code as the Campbell report was from the CPUO report 'order on campus' issued in 1968."

Heather Ridout said this position was different from the position explained in the SAC policy statement printed in the Varsity in November.

The straw vote on the referendum indicated six in favor of declaring one now, eight in favor of waiting until March to decide, and three against holding a referendum at all.

Most felt although there would be no doubt of a favorable outcome considerable organizing time would be needed and people would already be working on the SAC elections.

Anderson's recommendation favoring a referendum at the same time on raising the Ontario Federation of Students levy to $1.50 directly on students from 40 cents was also passed.

Another referendum on a $10 levy per student for construction of new athletic facilities proposed by the Joint Athletic Council was received with mixed feelings.

Many SAC reps felt the levy should be contingent on student control to be consistent with the October referendum supporting student majority on athletics decision making bodies.

Others felt the government, not students should pay for any construction. The money would be used for more squash courts, a covered rink beside Varsity arena and other projects to be decided later.

Parking policy upsets Thomas

By BOB BETTISON

The Governing Council's external affairs committee decided yesterday to rubber stamp the status quo parking policy already adopted by the business affairs and internal affairs committees.

The policy calls for retention of the present break even parking fees and a survey of campus parking needs and construction of parking structures.

An amendment was passed, suggested by alumnus William Broadhurst, calling for a review by January 1975 on the external relations impact of the parking policy.

He said the city civil servants were more favorable than the politicians, favoring Alderman Dorothy Thomas has an "unrealistic" attitude toward the parking issue.

Thomas has severely criticized the university's lack of effort in encouraging people to take public transit, not drive.

Thomas replied in an interview last night saying the university "is not being very helpful." She called their action "moving on the seat of their pants."

She said she did not know where Broadhurst got his idea about civil servants agreeing with the U of T. Thomas added her remarks were all based on parking policy recommendations of the public works department and its civil servants.

Gary Thaler, recently successfully granted tenure after presidential review, agreed with Broadhurst saying the committee should not proceed on the statements of elected politicians.

Thaler said the university's parking policy was quite acceptable from an outside standpoint.

U of T president John Evans said it will take time to implement any changes and claimed the university had to listen to the 40 per cent who opposed any change.

He added the university would take more time than a corporation because its policy wasn't implemented "by decree."

In the past Evans has advocated a resource consolidation and systems analysis approach to university government, adapted from corporate practices.

Thomas said the university can't consider its parking policy in isolation and as far as she is concerned there should be a negotiating committee set up to start work now.

"If you want to solve parking problems you don't wait, you start work tomorrow. Of course it takes time but it will take five years if you just sit around."

The public works committee is meeting Monday to discuss the city's response to the university parking policies. Thomas is chairwoman of the committee.

A report by Public Works Commissioner Ray Bremner was adopted unanimously by city council. The policy called on U of T to "immediately reduce the amount of reserved parking spaces provided and at the same time increase the prices charged for the use of such space."

The report called U of T, the provincial government and Ontario Hydro a "major cause of present traffic difficulties."

Administrator Lois Reimer said a survey could be completed next June and the policy considered after that.

With this issue Toronto's third largest morning newspaper, The Varsity, ceases publication until Wednesday, February 27. Here and Now forms for February 27-March 1 should be submitted on The Varsity editorial offices no later than 1 pm Tuesday, February 26.

The advertising deadline for the February 27 paper is Friday, February 22 at noon.

Rape crisis centre opens

By MARILYN EMERSON

At a press conference Wednesday evening at City Hall, members of the Toronto Rape Crisis Centre formally announced their opening.

Beginning February 14, a woman who has been raped may call the Rape Crisis Centre at 487-2345 any time 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

Victims will receive immediate help from the centre. Trained volunteers with cars will be available at all times to go out to the victim.

The victim will not be identified to police without her consent. The volunteers will accompany the victim to the hospital, if necessary, and remain with her at all times.

They will stay with her during police questioning, if she desires, and will continue their support through any subsequent police or legal procedures.

Despite increasing public awareness of the frequency with which a victim of rape must undergo an additional ordeal from unsympathetic or hostile authorities, little has been done until recently to assist victims with these problems.

The centre is entirely staffed by women volunteers from a large variety of backgrounds.

The volunteers have spent the last three months becoming familiar with the medical, police and legal procedures, as well as learning about some of the psychological factors involved in dealing with a woman in crisis.

Representatives from the Toronto General Hospital, Women's Place, the Metro Toronto police force, and the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry Forensic Department have met with the organizers of the centre, and are to provide a large number of resource people.

In co-operation with the centre, Toronto police are to refer rape calls to the centre.

All services will be given only at the express wish of the woman involved. In this way the centre hopes to reach many of the women who do not report the rape for any one of a variety of reasons.

Strictest confidentiality will be kept with respect to the users of the service.

Over the past six years there has been a rise of 76 per cent in the reported incidence of this offence.

Between 1971 and 1972 alone the rate rose 17.5 per cent, from 154 reported cases in 1971 to 181 in 1972. These facts inspired a group of Toronto women to organize a rape crisis centre to assist the victims of rape.

The centre is at present dependent on donations. A fund-raising committee is exploring the possibilities for long-range funding such as has been found for rape crisis centres in other cities.

The centre is applying for status as a charitable organization.

Lorene Clark, a philosophy professor at U of T said the main aims of the centre are to support the victim, and to provide education and research on the subject of rape.

Workshops are to be set up to allow women to come together to discuss their experiences.

Ottawa cuts student jobs

By MIKE EDWARDS

OTTAWA—Students interested in working for the federal government this summer should get an early start.

The government plans to cut the number of summer jobs available by 50 per cent.

This information comes from the student president at Carleton University, Ann Frazer. She was given the information by a high government official except the official wished to remain anonymous.

According to the informed source, the government intends to give increased priority to the hiring of high-school and community college students.

Frazer was particularly upset by the news. "60 per cent of Carleton students are from the Ottawa area. They need government jobs in order to continue their education. There is no other industry in Ottawa."

Frazer saw the latest move as a conscious progression on the part of the federal and provincial governments to cut back the number of students in attendance at universities.

She had attended a federal provincial ministers conference in June where students were told they need to be more "specialized," according to the needs of industry. Apparently "industry" does not "need" university students.

government funding of universities. "They want to get students into more productive courses," she said.

This latest government move corresponds to a scaling down of the OFY program which is also a major source of summer jobs for students.

However, students should not fear the situation unduly. The latest issue of Time magazine (Canada), contains a full page ad imploring industry to hire students for the summer.

O'Donohue wins at Scarborough

John O'Donohue was elected president of the Scarborough College Student Council yesterday as the college registered its highest turnout ever for a local election.

With 829 of Scarborough's 2,600 students voting, O'Donohue received 382 votes to presidential contender Scott Cavalier's 163. Don Allen, O'Donohue's running mate for vice-president (full-time), was also elected over Cavalier's partner Allan Beacock by a 288-169 margin.

Gary Heighington was acclaimed in the other top position—vice-president (part-time).

Second year reps for the SCS, Bill Deneault and Bill Warburton, both Cavalier supporters, were also acclaimed, while Ann Brener (an O'Donohue supporter) and Brian Toole (Cavalier) captured the third year rep seats.

Both presidential candidates also split the fourth year rep support, as O'Donohue supporter Deborah Barkhouse and Cavalier backer Joyce Martino each gained a seat.

Part-time SCS reps for next year will be Joy McNall and Connie Zboch, both O'Donohue supporters. Although Cavalier was defeated in his bid for the SCS presidency, he captured the most number of votes in the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) rep category polling 383. Other Scarborough SAC reps on next year's cross-university undergraduate council are Norman Rietti (360) and Greg Fitz (296), both independents. Thre O'Donohue supporters—Ouida Seung, Vivian Rossman, and Bruce Edwards—will also represent Scarborough on SAC.

Two SCS first year reps will be elected next fall.

3. We believe the Code of Discipline represents the view that function is more important than essence and substance, that appearance is more important than reality.
4. We believe that the Code of Discipline contributes even more to the impersonality, the sense of loneliness experienced not only by the newcomer, but also by those who have been on the campus for years.
5. What is needed is an administration which is outgoing, daily mixing with campus population in "coming-together" informal affairs. In a time when fear of tomorrow inspires centralisation of authority, the administration should decentralise to encourage college and departmental creativity. In a time when the university experience is often the biggest bore of all, disagreement, disenchantment with the administration should be seen as life in the dry bones of academe.

Metro Parks delays decision on SMC land

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Metro Parks committee yesterday postponed a decision on whether to acquire 10 acres of land owned by St. Michael's college, pending a presentation by the Forest Hill Residents' Association on February 28.

The financially desperate college has offered to sell the land, which includes both ravines and tableland, for $4.25 million, based on its value for high-rise development.

Cadillac Development Corp. owns first option on the land, and through the firm of Diamond and Myers has proposed a medium density, low rise housing scheme for the tableland area.

The St. Mike's property borders on the ravine through which the Spadina subway will run thus creating pressure for both housing and parkland.

The Forest Hill Residents' Association, with the support of aldermen Anne Johnston and David Smith, is asking Metro to buy the land for park purposes.

The residents' brief states: "These lands should become part of the ravine and park lands in order to help alleviate the deficiency of park land in the township of York and the city of Toronto in this area."

"These properties are so well integrated into the ravine and existing park lands...that to consider them for anything but park land would be alien to the retention of the natural characteristics of the area. These lands are unique and once lost are irreplaceable."

One Forest Hill resident at the Parks committee meeting accused St. Mike's of being a "terrible neighbor." He said the college had allowed fill to be dumped on the tableland, covering the natural foliage. The college he said, had never even talked to the residents.

He also said the firm of Diamond and Myers, which had several meetings with the residents, had medium density housing proposals in mind right from the start.

Diamond has said he met with the residents on an entirely open-ended basis to begin with.

Metro Parks commissioner Tony Thompson recommended to the committee no action be taken on the residents' request; a tacit approval of the housing scheme. He also urged public access to the ravine portion of St. Mike's land be guaranteed.

Thompson estimates the value to Metro of the St. Mike's land to be between $2 million and $3 million, much less than the $4.25 million St. Mike's is asking.

Metro chairman Paul Godfrey said while he felt the land should ideally be acquired as public open space, it was "unrealistic to acquire it."

He said it was beyond the financial capability of Metro to buy the land,

Parks Commissioner Thompson explains to astonished committee members how to turn water into wine and if Metro did buy the land, it would set a precedent whereby other municipalities would ask Metro to do their spending.

City alderman Fred Beavis said government was "going crazy about buying parks." The taxpayer, he thought, was paying too much for parkland.

Beavis then upbraided the city and Metro who were "not smart enough" to buy parkland quickly, who waited until a developer assembled land and asked a higher price.

Beavis said he would recommend the city not buy the land, which would be a "false economy."

Highlight of the meeting was a spontaneous burst of emotion from the otherwise all-male committee, who presented alderman Elizabeth Eayrs with a gaudy Valentine card.

"We felt we'd been nasty all year" admitted Godfrey.

"I'm very touched," replied Eayrs.

Tanzania in transition to socialism: Saul

By MARGARET ROBERTSON

Because of progressive elements in the leadership, the development of Tanzania as an independent state has been atypical of former African colonies. Canadian author and political scientist John Saul told a Toronto audience Wednesday night.

He described Tanzania as currently being in a position of "transitional autonomy." Who will finally rule is not yet clear, he said, but there has been a greater link between the leadership and the rural masses than is usual in Africa.

President Nyerere, who came to power when independence was granted in 1961, warned against the mere substitution of black faces for white in the leadership.

He saw the importance of creating worker and peasant groups in order to form a broader and more popular base for the state.

However, Saul said, this being done from the top tended to defuse the attempts at decentralization.

Peasant organization has been largely unsuccessful, although a few of the poorer and more middle class people have made some attempt at communal agriculture.

The level of political consciousness of the workers, however, has increased markedly, Saul said, from simple walk-outs in 1970 to the occupation of factories and continued production in 1973.

"This is really a rather progressive form of strike," he added.

The actions were directed at employers who were too authoritarian rather than at obtaining higher wages or better working conditions.

President Nyerere no longer supports the workers wholeheartedly, however.

At times he will commend their actions, but at others "the police arrive," said Saul.

He was unable to attribute the President's attitude to a particular cause, or to see a rational pattern behind the reactions to the strikes.

Saul commented "a somewhat more disparate gamble" and a stronger proletarian line are required, but either the president's power has weakened or he has turned his attention to the problems of Southern Africa.

The organization of workers and peasants has been counteracted by the more rapid formation and consolidation of a class of Africans who control the state machinery.

Saul said the weakness of the bourgeoisie is making it easy for these conservative elements to take over.

Their keynotes tend to be education and former government service.

Asked about the role of the military in Tanzania, Saul replied it has been incorporated into the system.

The Portuguese are now bombing close to the Tanzanian border and a peoples' force was set up in the rural areas against the possibility of invasion, but it has not had the hoped for implications and tends to be largely drilling, Saul said.

Saul said he saw no increase in security measures in Tanzania during a visit last month.

While there is some positive involvement in the liberation struggles of her neighbors, Tanzania views them largely as military confrontations with the rather abstract goal of independence.

There is little actual feedback as a mutual learning experience, Saul said.

Saul, now an active member of the Toronto Committee for the Liberation of Portuguese Colonies and the author of several books on African politics, was formerly a political science lecturer at the University of Dar es Salaam in Tanzania from 1965 to 1972.

Chaiton victor in GSU race

By ART MOSES

A veteran activist from the heyday of the U of T student power movement has been elected interim president of the Graduate Students' Union.

With results still unofficial, educational theory student Alf Chaiton appears to have coasted to an easy victory in balloting Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday.

Chaiton topped sociology grad George Parakulam 222 to 75.

Chaiton's main strength was at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education where he is enrolled, and where he picked up 125 of his votes.

But he also topped Parakulam on the rest of the campus.

Chaiton headed the Political Economy Course Union while a U of T undergrad from 1967-71. During that time political economy students conducted a major drive for decision-making power within the department and vocally challenged the appointment of J. Stephan Dupre as chairman in 1969.

The faculty managed to diffuse student organizing by establishing a series of negotiating committees, while actually opposing all efforts toward student input in major decisions.

Although fairly conservative when he first entered student politics, Chaiton moved to a more radical position after some course union work.

He left U of T for the London School of Economics in 1971 where he received his MA in economics in 1972.

The mid-year GSU election was forced by the resignation of former president Cliff Watson.

Watson left because other GSU officials did not consider the presidency a full-time job.

Chaiton will take office once results are made official, and will remain until early May.

In his campaign Chaiton promised to develop the GSU into an effective lobby for grad students with university and government.

"Work must be started to initiate policy on such major issues as student income, teaching assistantships, employment etc.," he said in a campaign statement.

Parakulam disagreed, saying the GSU could only be effective as a decentralized organization based on active course unions.

He also wanted to GSU to work more closely with other campus organizations and help students involve themselves more closely in the outside community.

Both candidates were opposed to the concept of the GSU as merely a social club, providing only a bar and wine and cheese parties.

The small turnout, representing only about five per cent of eligible graduate students, is a perennial GSU problem.

The election was the first in three years. During that time acclamations have been the rule.

The first GSU-conducted vote since 1970 was last December's referendum when 350 grad students voted to join the National Union of Students and support the GSU's demand for a guaranteed annual income for grads.

Chaiton is currently a member of the OISE Graduate Students' Association, an executive member of the OISE Institute Assembly, and a member of the Research Policy sub-committee of the Governing Council.

'Arrogant' parking policy intolerable

Ward 9 Alderman Dorothy Thomas has properly called U of T's parking policy "arrogant."

She hit the centre of the issue, and yesterday's external affairs committee meeting was proof of that.

Recently - tenured Erindale professor Gary Thaler leaned back and said U of T's parking policy was quite acceptable from an outside standpoint.

With all due respect, Gary, you're full of beans.

City council unanimously passed commission of Public Works Ray Bremner's report which termed U of T, the provincial government and Ontario Hydro "a major cause of our present traffic difficulties."

That's what the outside view is, Professor Thaler.

External affairs alumni member William Broadhurst gave us a supreme taste of Simcoe Hall arrogance when he said civil servants were more favorable than the politicians.

May we point out, Bill, the Bremner report was prepared by civil servants and they are not so favorably disposed to U of T's parking policy.

Those civil servants urged U of T to immediately cut back on university parking and rise the parking rates.

May we suggest, Bill, you've talked to a different set of civil servants than those who wrote the city's parking policy. The politicians, we might add, have simply begun to implement the civil service's recommendations.

Yesterday's meeting could have been a turnaround for Simcoe Hall, since external affairs is the only committee of Governing Council empowered to deal with the city's objections.

But despite repeated claims to listen to the community around the university, external affairs choose instead to heed its own counsel.

University president John Evans is even back peddling from his statement last November when he said:

"If the municipality moved to reduce parking, we will follow. But we will not unilaterally reduce parking if transit is not adequate."

Yesterday's line from Dr. John was that he has to listen to the minority 40 per cent who oppose cutting back parking.

Well, well, Dr. Evans. For a person who advocates democratic principles, what about the majority 60 per cent?

City hall's main objection to U of T parking policy is the university's refusal to reduce the number of parking spaces and the simultaneous construction of parking structures.

Quite properly, we feel, Thomas is taking the entire U of T parking issue to the city public works committee meeting Monday.

She has already said if necessary she will ask for the required legal authority from Metro and the provincial government to force U of T to change its parking views.

Hopefully, Simcoe Hall will wake up before then.

We have heard countless platitudes from assorted university administrators about working with the community.

If those comments were made in good faith, it's about high time the university made good on them.

U of T is not isolated from the community it lives in. It is an integral part of the downtown community and must accept its responsibilities to the downtown urban environment.

Thomas is quite willing to work with U of T. She proposed last week a formal liaison with the university over the parking policy issue so some sort of agreement could be worked out.

That's pretty reasonable. Just where Mr. Broadhurst finds the grounds to call Thomas "unrealistic" is a mystery to us. Rather we see the university position as unrealistic.

The grand old days of gas guzzling monsters clogging the highways and byways of Toronto with their steel and belching exhaust are rapidly drawing to a close.

If the ecology argument doesn't convince the die-hards, maybe the energy crisis will. For an institution which might be thought to be a leader of progressive thinking, U of T has fallen flat on its face.

Code referendum must call for repeal

"Some Notes on the Discipline Struggle at U of T", Gregory attacked the Varsity, but merely said "I do not wish to dispute the line at this time—they (the Varsity) are clearly incorrect for apparent reasons."

That may be so, Mr. Gregory, we don't pretend to be infallible. But we would like to see some intelligent criticism of our position rather than the continuous ranting at individuals at SAC.

Unlike Mr. Gregory who stated in his position paper (mentioned above) that "our position is the only intelligent one", we do leave some room for intelligent discussion of the issues.

We maintain we have been consistent on the discipline question while SAC has continuously obscured the issues at stake by constantly rephrasing its position.

The administration is definitely wrong to impose a code on students and we have said that time and time again.

However, we will not be complicit in any SAC decision to accept an academic code as long as a non-academic code is not implemented. To do so would be to disregard the significant minority of students—about 3,000 at present have called for repeal of the Conway-Cadario code.

SAC seems to interpret the 3,000 signatures differently—as carte blanche to go ahead and do whatever it feels is necessary. That was not the question being asked in the mailing and petition campaign and that is not the response SAC should be giving.

SAC must call for repeal of the code. The administration must not be allowed to pass the necessary legislation to implement the code.

The administration cannot enforce the code without students' consent, and that consent has not been forthcoming from the student body. SAC should only consent to accept a code if students express their desire for one. So far they haven't.

The Students' Administrative Council may hold a referendum on discipline to coincide with the SAC presidential elections March 13-14. We think it would be a good idea if the referendum question asked for repeal of the Conway-Cadario code.

At yesterday's SAC meeting SAC rep Rick Gregory accused the Varsity of confusing the discipline issue by calling for no negotiations and said the paper should be criticizing the administration, not SAC. Mr. Gregory obviously hasn't been reading the Varsity this year. We have been constantly criticizing the administration on several issues, one of them being discipline.

Mr. Gregory's intemperate attacks seem to be unleashed on everyone who differs from the SAC policy on discipline. We don't feel he's the only person to have the "correct line".

Integration of athletics is merely token

In reading over your interim report on Athletic Structures, I was mainly distraught over the picture you presented of "integration" on our campus. I was bothered by two points:

1. The integration seems to be token and far from the integrated structures we witness at universities across Canada.
 2. The integration does not really exist at the very critical basic levels!
- It seems to me that we should consider total integration of men's and women's athletics and the School of Physical and Health Education at the departmental, day to day basis. In doing so, we would be admitting that males and females basically have the same social and physical needs for activity. We would also be admitting that the School of Physical and Health Education can provide important professional leadership and direction to athletics at University of Toronto.

The implications of this are really not that alarming. It should better provide the opportunity for much needed co-educational athletic programmes including track and field, swimming, gymnastics, racket games, golf, hockey, skating and the whole spectrum of intramural activities. It should reduce the cumbersome staff cross-appointments, replication of duties, and over lapping of jurisdiction, which currently plague the three departments. The more efficient use of present staff and the more logical hiring of future staff would not signal sudden wholesale unemployment of many of our athletic instructors, conversely it should free the staff to concentrate on their area of interest and perhaps gain some additional training or knowledge to be passed on to the student.

The economy of communication and space in such an integrated set-up should become invaluable when the directors of the concerned groups can immediately meet and consult on such problems as scheduling, conflicts, facility allocation shifts or, day to day and special programmes. Unique male and female problems can be adequately handled by subcommittees or by sub-departmental actions.

When we examine the historical background to this question, the evidence begins to mount. In the task force appointed by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada in 1966, to explore possible governing structures for University Athletics, a total integrated department or Faculty of Physical and Health Education, Athletics and Recreation was strongly recommended. Now almost all of the major campuses across Canada have opted for a similar governing scheme and they all have been documented successes. And currently, both the School of Physical and Health Education and the men's athletic department have gone on record as supporting total departmental integration!

This might be an unfair criticism, but it seems to me that there is so much concern over the exact make-up or constituents of each of these various proposed subcommittees, that little thought has gone into the philosophy and the workings of the governing structure. It seems logical that we should get straight why and where we are going before we decide who is going to take us there. It appears that a modified version of our present set-up, coupled with token integration and clouded by numbers which are supposed to show student orientation is being presented to us, instead of a governing structure which logically expresses policy objectives, philosophy of sport on our campus, and expedient, up-to-date government.

Therefore, I would urge you to look more deeply into these issues.

1. Look at how our athletic government reflects the policy objectives as accepted by the internal affairs committee.
2. Look at the record of other universities across Canada and the recommendations of two out of the three concerned groups on our campus.

3. Look at the need for widespread co-ed sporting activities at all levels.
 4. Look at the potential leadership the School of Physical and Health Education has to offer.
 5. Look at the most efficient utilization of our present and future staff.
 6. Look at the potential communication and administrative streamlining other structures provide.
 7. Look at the mandate supplied by the students at University of Toronto on this very issue last spring.
- Attached is an alternate proposal, identical to the one I discussed with the Men's Directorate. The academic side of Physical and Health Education will have reporting responsibilities through academic affairs.
- Sport's Council: policy, budget and general facility allocation members - predominantly lay and students
- Department: day to day activities, programming, staffing and coaching!
- The various departments within the overall department can also be further subdivided for specific male or female orientated activities.

USSR not only one persecuting

I have become very tired of the pious attitude in this country and in the west in general, about the exiling of Alexander Soljenitzen. We are browbeaten by a press that unceasingly holds his case up as an example of the lack of freedoms and persecution of intellectuals in that vile society of the Soviet Union. So what, what else is new? Any individualist is persecuted by any society in which he lives as soon as he steps out of the narrow confines which it puts on him: it is just that in the Soviet Union the state is that much more restrictive than here at the present. Memories are short, it is not so long ago that one 'treacherous' E. Pound was 'exiled' from society by being placed in a mental institution for his political views; it is not so long since the McCarthy era in the US (and Canada) which saw individuals being deprived of their rights to live in peace and security (exiled in a sense) for the political views which they were alleged to possess.

The word 'exile' has many meanings and connotations. From what is known of the Stalinist era in Russia, and from the fate of a number of Soljenitzen's fellow 'dissenter-writers,' Alexander is lucky for there are worse things than deportation from one's country of origin as we have seen: Recently a British team of psychiatrists investigated both Soviet, American and European practices in the incarcerations of people deemed insane to the point of being a menace to society; the results were interesting, being for the Soviet Union an estimated 50 per cent, of people being normal, for the US an estimated 30 per cent! and for those countries in Europe that were studied about 15 per cent. How can we justify our pious position now?

I do not seek to defend the Soviet Union in her action, though I do take note of what the leader of the Canadian Communist Party, Kashtan, said about Soljenitzen having violated Soviet law by not having observed a summons issued by the State Procurator, although that is a poor excuse. What I do seek is an end to the wholesale condemnation of the Soviet Union's policies to her citizens which everyone knows are reprehensible; we should put our own house in order before waging crusades which, as history has shown, always seem to beg the question, and are never for the reasons or excuses issued by the promoters of such activities.

Frontier College helps unskilled

Discrimination against the poor and disadvantaged is nothing new. 24 per cent of the labour force in Canada. One in four working as having only eight years of education or less. This figure is higher than in any other modern industrial nation: many included within it are said to be "functionally illiterate."

These people are members of unskilled transient or seasonal sections of the labour force. Because they are often unfamiliar with their rights, they are subject to discrimination from unscrupulous employers and uncaring governments. With a background of apathy bred by poverty, they have often neither the will nor the way to avail themselves of existing opportunities for improved employment.

Attempting to close the gap between such second-class citizens and the rest of Canada is a small, non-profit organization called Frontier College.

Better than bringing the students to education, Frontier College takes education to the students in mining and logging camps, construction and remote locations, fishing towns and isolated communities in every province and territory of the country. Other than making use of professional teachers Frontier College seeks adaptable university graduates and graduates who have the willingness to improve.

Instead of attempting to communicate across unbridgeable social and cultural distances, these field workers relate to their communities as human beings, labouring for their share as company employees alongside everyone else. Frontier calls these people labourer-teachers.

One hundred labourer-teachers — men and women — are recruited every year from among 2,000 applicants throughout the country. They serve for a minimum period of six months; many work for a complete year or more. Two thirds of the labourers are in the field during the summer and one third during the winter.

Field-workers are guaranteed a net wage of $1,200 for four months of service. If their job assignment nets them less income than $1,200 Frontier makes up the difference through an income equalization allowance.

Frontier also pays minimum transportation costs to and from the assignment and supplies materials to support the educational activities on location.

The labourer-teacher is expected to sound out the needs and, if necessary motivate the desires of his community before setting up a program. Many labourer-teachers find that classes in basic English or French consume much of their time; others are more involved with film programs and sports tournaments. Still others have taught anything from sketching to civil law. After a full day's shift of manual labour it's a heavy program.

Diamond says his firm hired

I have read your piece on the SMC land in the Varsity, and, with one exception, I believe it to be a generally accurate reporting. As I mentioned to you on the telephone, it is this firm, i.e. Diamond & Myers which was hired, and which as collectively been responsible for the projects, both current and completed, and not simply Jack Diamond.

I would be grateful if you would see to it in future that any coverage in Varsity on the work of this firm, or projects in which we are engaged, were attributed to the firm rather than an individual.

Pro-abortionist attacks CPL

If anyone was feeling down or depressed on Wednesday around 4 p.m., they should have been at the Hart House Debates Room for a good laugh. The Pro-Life was there in small numbers and although they didn't bring their usual array of pickled fetuses and glossy photographs, they did bring a few children to instill guilt in the hearts of the opposition. The really amusing thing, however, was listening to the new slant on "communism" presented by the CPL (under the guise of the SDS in the advertisements) who have decided that when Marx cried "Workers of the world unite!" he was referring to copulation.

"We should have more children to fight for socialism," Mr. Shabas said to explain the CPL's stand against abortion in Canada (unfortunately I neglected to ask Mr. Shabas what percentage of the army he had contributed so far, as I take his free use of the word "we" to include men as well as women... somewhere in Toronto is a house with 10 tiny tots drilling for the revolution, is he supporting all of them?)

"And what of my right to choose, as a socialist woman, whether or not that is to be my part in the revolution?" I asked, thinking that breeding wasn't my specialty and maybe this was one revolution I would skip.

The gist of his answer was that I don't have that "abstract" right as far as he is concerned (and that is to birth control as well as abortion) as I must consider the social context and not be selfish. I've often noted with what zeal people can sacrifice other people for The Cause, when they have nothing to lose. The promotion of birth control and abortion is, according to the CPL, a capitalist conspiracy to reduce the numbers of the working class. (My God, is Women's liberation a capitalist plot?) In this light we must consider the Canadian government's persecution of Dr. Morgentaler and refusal to repeal the anti-abortion laws as (a) a "move" by the capitalists to gain massive communist support (???), or (b) the proof of the pudding that Trudeau is, indeed, a communist or (c) a "feint" by the capitalists to throw the communists into confusion. Looking at the CPL this last point has possibilities.

Women want birth control and abortion because they can't afford to have children in the capitalist system, said Jan Depoe, also of the CPL, not because they freely choose not to. "I've never heard a woman say she didn't want a child simply because she didn't want one." (She said that last part with a straight face, amazing woman.)

"What about the socialist women who demand abortion as their right?" I asked again, thinking of the YS members on the Committee to Defend Dr. Morgentaler.

"Trotskyites!"

(My God, is the abortion campaign a Trotskyite plot?)

...I forgot to ask Ms. Depoe how many soldiers she can account for.... Attacking the Catholic Church which receives the brunt of abortion criticism, is a form of racism Mr. Shabas points out, as Anglo-Saxon protestants are concerned with the spread of French-Canadians and Catholics in general. Considering the fact that the Catholic Church is the greatest opponent of communism and encourages reactionary conservatism, I think it very magnanimous of Mr. Shabas to worry about its loss of followers. (I wonder if the RC Church appreciates it?) Mr. Shabas, you should inform the Québécois in Le Comité pour la Défense du Dr. Morgentaler that they are betraying the homeland. After all there's nothing new in Anglophones telling French-Canadians what's best for them, maux peux-tu parler français? The feudal overlords of old New France would turn over in their graves to hear "communists" siding with them in the Quebec baby boom boon.

soon the CPL will be advocating higher baby bonuses and prizes for with the largest families. (Good God, is the CPL a capitalist plot?)

"Stalinists are always gross," someone commented behind me.

"Oh," I thought, "that's what they are."

"They've threatened to exterminate me," Maureen told me calmly.

"Christ, you're joking."

"No," she said that's the only way to handle reactionaries."

Well, it will be a motley group at the tribunal in Ottawa, March 9, if the CPL are to be understood (not an easy task). There will be racists, capitalists, Trotskyites, anglophone imperialists, francophone traitors, and a varied assortment of reactionaries from Left to Right.

Personally, I hope some women go.

Abortion is a Woman's Issue. The right to control our bodies is ours in any system.

Levitt writes to Varsity again

I would like to comment upon two possibly minor but nevertheless disturbing items in your paper of Friday, February 8. The first was your reference to Jill Conway, vice-president internal affairs. There are, no doubt, several decisions made by professor Conway in which her judgement can be seriously questioned and even attacked. But your dismissal of her as Australian-born is quite unfortunate.

Besides the insipid and potentially dangerous nature of this attack, the implication that a foreign-born administrator is somehow less desirable is worrisome. Surely Ms. Conway is far better capable of dealing with the problems that arise in this university, than are many of her Canadian peers.

Perhaps with a little more analysis, the writer of this editorial might perceive that the forces which induce the university administration to make decisions disadvantageous, and often injurious, to students are unrelated to the national origins of that administration. Correspondingly, the obtaining of a more humane and critical university will be entirely independent of the nationality of either senior administrative officials or faculty. Surely the editorialist would want neither expertise nor responsiveness in administrators to be sacrificed for the dubious benefits of Canadian birth.

I certainly hope that the editorialist is not abstaining from the fight for tenure for Dr. Salaf on the grounds that he is American. I am quite sure that the editorialist can think of many qualified Canadians that he would less rather see in Ms. Conway's place than herself.

My second point concerns the attack by your sports editor, Lawrence Clarke, on a potential candidate for the Varsity's editorship. I hardly believe the pages of the newspaper to be a suitable place from which to jockey for that newspaper's coming editorship.

It is quite legitimate to publicly attack public figures like Dr. Evans and myself (although possibly misguided, particularly in the latter case). But I must seriously condemn the sport's editor judgement in attacking a student who has done nothing to warrant being condemned in the public eye, despite what personal grievances the sports editor might have. The suggestions that Mr. Bettison would ruin the paper and the references to his 'cold Germanic charm' plumb the depths of journalistic sordidness.

Forster tenure rep. misquoted

It's a small point, but for some reason you misrepresented my views on selection of students for tenure committees, February 6, to make it seem that my position differed from others you quoted.

If you examine my letter to Mrs. Barten you will see that I did not state that tenure decisions "should be left in the hands of the students" as you reported it — from which one could conclude that I support complete student control of tenure, which I consider a crazy idea. What I said was in fact the same as you reported as the position of APUS and the Faculty of Education student union, namely that given the principle of student membership on tenure committees, the selection of those students "should be left in the hands of the students."

Secondly, you state that I favour graduate students for positions on tenure committees, whereas what I said was really the same as that which you attributed to Professor G.R. Williams, namely that the place to start in gradually introducing students to tenure decisions was with graduate students. I said nothing about the ultimate composition of the student contingent of such committees. Indeed my position seems to be covered so well by the combination of all the others you quoted that I wonder that you bothered to cite me at all.

Cameron lauds SAC decision

We welcome SAC's decision to put forward strongly and explicitly its position on the principles that must be incorporated into any code. SAC has consistently supported an alternative to the Conway-Cadario Code but had been reluctant to argue strongly for it because of a desire to maintain unity with certain leftist groups on the discipline steering committee. Some of the present confusions and accusations might have been avoided if SAC had strongly put forward its own position from the beginning and invited groups and individuals to organize around it, rather than trying to find a compromise with the RMG and the YS.

Some valuable work in canvassing residences with petitions and in manning tables was accomplished by the committee against the discipline code. However, from the very beginning there were fundamental differences between the position of the two Trotskyist groups (YS and RMG) and that of SAC, the GSU and all the other groups and individuals associated with the steering committee. These differences were submerged and masked under the slogan "Repeal the Code". The impossibility of the steering committee continuing to work together on this basis became completely clear at the January Governing Council meeting when the RMG and the YS members loudly and rudely heckled Governing Council members who spoke in support of the SAC position, including its representative of the part-time undergraduate students, Norma Brindal. So called "unity" of the steering committee was violated in practice in a most destructive way by RMG and YS.

There is in fact no difference between the YS and the RMG positions on the discipline code. Both uphold the "no-code-ever" position and both sought continuously to use the "Repeal the Code" slogan to push their own position.

Both RMG and the YS question the right of the democratically elected representatives of the students — SAC, GSU and APUS — to represent students in negotiations with the administration. (In this, these two "revolutionary" groups share the position of the right-wing faculty that elected student representatives represent nobody and therefore should not be listened to). In their most recent letters to the Varsity, both persist in their view that SAC and the GSU were just two other groups on the steering committee comparable in support to, say, the RMG or the YS. Finally, both groups simplistically counterpose negotiations and mass action, pretending that SAC can only do one or the other when in fact it is doing both.

The U of T Communist Club stopped working on the steering committee after the childish performance by the RMG and the YS at the Governing Council meeting. At the time we pulled off the committee, however, we made it clear that we supported an alternative to the Conway-Cadario Code and were quite prepared to work with SAC if and when it made its position on an alternative clear. SAC has now done this and we have offered to help with any work needed to mobilize students for the March Governing Council meeting in support of the SAC position. The Communist Club is willing to work on any committee organized around the stated SAC position. We are not interested in working on a "steering committee" that is nothing more than a platform for the pious sermons of the RMG or the YS. We don't have the time — we have essays to write and exams to study for.

The Varsity has a most peculiar interpretation of the petition being circulated against the discipline code. The petition does not call for "unconditional" rejection of the discipline code. Rather, it states quite explicitly that signing the petition does not commit you to any position on whether or not there should be an alternative code. The Varsity is quite right that SAC should be talking to the students about its position on the discipline code. Hopefully, the Varsity is quite right that SAC should be talking to the students at least in the news sections if not in the editorials. Then the elected representatives of the students would not be forced to buy an ad in the student press in order to get their position across to students.

Hats off to Larry for witty sports coverage

Great! Nostalgia hits the sports page. Lawrence Clarke revealed his innate wit on the back page of the Varsity, on Friday, January 8. Dealing with a whole page of names and scores can too easily become a dull exercise for both writer and reader, and so I was delighted to see Clarke's light-hearted jab at Rick, Lisa, Sam and Bob, who graced the back of the previous issue.

The printing of such an article reflects not only on the quick-witted Mr. Clarke, but on his editor. Truly, such divergence of style and opinion in a single publication is indicative of an open-minded policy and can only credit Mr. Robert Gauthier and his editorial staff.

Again, let us say that I think it sportsmanlike of the Varsity to be so novel. You livened my day, sir: keep up the humor, Mr. Clarke.

Bliss charges distortion made

The anonymous reporter who summarized my letter on tenure to the academic affairs subcommittee (Varsity, February 6) distorted some points and omitted others.

I did not accuse only students who want to serve on tenure committees as having ulterior motives. What I wrote was, "one can reasonably assume an ulterior motive on the part of anyone, student or faculty, who actively desires to serve on a tenure committee."

My letter also suggested that the appeal procedures recommended in the report of the Task Force on Academic Appointments were "the best possible guarantee that tenure committees would make responsible decisions that took the teaching function fully into account. Any decision which failed to do this would give the person most affected by it, the candidate himself, adequate grounds for appeal."

Further, the letter recognized "a student interest in assuring over-all consistency of tenure decisions throughout the university", and indicated my support for a university-wide tenure committee with student representation.

Conacher clarifies his tenure views

It is perhaps expecting a bit much to look for detailed accuracy in your brief and (for the most part) fair summary of the debate in the Trinity College Council on the motion to add a student member to tenure and other staffing committees. I should like to point out, however, that I did not say (as quoted) that "students are...not the best judges of teaching ability." I said that students are probably the best judges of classroom presentation, "teaching personality etc." but that students are not the best judges of course content (i.e., they are, at least in many cases, not the best judges of the material which should be presented in a given course). I also suggested that, since it is difficult to separate these two related aspects of the teaching situation, this second consideration did at least qualify the bald assertion that students are the best judges of an instructor's performance in the classroom.

In fairness to my own views (however misguided), I hope that you will print this brief clarification of your report.

Island to celebrate

Toronto Island residents say the Winter Carnival tomorrow and Sunday is not the last one despite Metro's decision to evict the islanders by August 31.

It's the 150th anniversary and costumes worn by islanders will pepper the cross country skiing, family skating, curling, hockey, snow shoe races, ice baseball and other assorted fun in the snow including tavern and food.

Dinner and dancing in the island clubhouse Saturday night, and if nobody's hung over too badly 11 a.m. church at St. Andrews-By-The-Lake and more food at noon Sunday.

Even if it's not the last winter carnival, it's a weekend show worth participating in.

'Grocer' Heath plays power game with Britain

By PHIL WEST

ALTERNATE NEWS SERVICE

A new game for all the family was printed recently in an English Sunday newspaper. It was the type of game which starts and ends in the same place - with advances and retreats decided by the space on the board.

For this unique game, some examples were: "No trains (or petrol), start again"; "You bought your candles last year, go forward"; "No rationing announced, burn ration books to keep warm"; "You buy a horse and cart, go forward"; then "no foodstuffs, you sell the horse, go slow".

The name of the game was 'Gloom', and it was, as might be guessed, a political cartoon. But there was a sort of truth to it in reality - it signified the incredible power game that the Conservative government here is playing out with the British people.

Heath makes election issue trade unions versus government

For prime minister Edward Heath, the issue is a riddle he's turned into an election slogan - "Who's running this country the government or the unions?"

The grocer, as Heath is affectionately called, is prepared to call in the police and the army in his war against the trade unions. And he has some rather strange support from the North American continent in a team of CIA agents who are busily infiltrating the ranks of militant unionists.

The battle started properly in December, in the midst of the propaganda about an oil crisis which caused long queues for petrol in London. For the British coal miners, it seemed an opportune time to implement a ban on overtime in support of pay-raise demands.

The miners, like all British workers, have been subject to two phases of an economic policy which banned wage increases while allowing massive price rises common world wide. When Prime Minister Heath introduced phase three, which allowed for relatively meagre rises in comparison to the cost of living advance, the mineworkers decided the time had come for action. But they were not prepared, along with the rest of the population, for the hysterical response from the government.

The propaganda released was designed to convince the people that the miners, in tandem with the Arab oil sheikhs, were the cause of all the problems of the little European island which has lost an empire. Such a suggestion was of course patently untrue.

The miners have little control over the massive $800 million trade deficit in December, or the floundering of the pound to a value of only $2.10, or the failure of a large bank and an investment corporation to herald the onrushing depression here. Or, indeed, the statement by a British banker that the British economy will not recover for 10 to 20 years, if ever.

In this understandably tight situation, the government embarked on a course designed to win an election early this year before the whole country collapses. The miners presented the perfect opportunity and Heath and the whole government jumped on the coaltruck.

The usual release of figures for coal and oil stocks were suddenly withdrawn from distribution, and in their place were statements of critical shortage.

For an encore, the grocer introduced a three day week for power to industry, designed to cut pay packets and produce losses of almost $1 billion in production each week to slow the rampant inflation.

Further punishment was meted out to the general population, but especially the working class, by restriction of national television to close at 10:30 pm each night.

Drastic coal strike not an emergency

The most prominent reason from the government for these rash over-reactions was supposedly a drastic coal shortage. The claim was that the miners' overtime ban (not a strike) had cut supplies to power stations, and because of the simultaneous oil shortage, power cuts were necessary. In fact, it has been a continuing policy of successive British governments to close down coal mining pits and rely increasingly on cheap oil from the middle east.

Since nationalization of the industry in 1947, the government has closed more than 600 of the 900 pits then worked. Not only has this almost halved production from 209 million tons in 1956 to 118 last year, but it has also caused a massive migration of coal miners from the pit areas to the cities.

That policy has not been rescinded even in the present circumstances.

Even without this historical perspective, the claims of a coal shortage resulting in a closure of power stations are suspect at least. Early in the "crisis", various investigative journalists discovered stations closed or operating below capacity which had three and four times their normal stock of coal.

Exports of coal to other European countries have not been affected either - each month almost 350,000 metric tons were shipped out.

The government, however, is not relying solely on the coal shortage for their measures; there is also an "oil crisis". Here again the figures fail to prove the point. They show that the government has more than tripled stocks of oil at power stations since it took power in 1970, and that stocks are now larger than they were in 1972. In that year, the miners called a full strike, and the same government did not find it necessary to work a three day week, or introduce other restrictions.

Three day work week unnecessary

The introduction of the three day week on such flimsy evidence has not failed to produce adverse reaction. But the power restrictions are also causing other problems, especially in the steel industry.

Many products are in short supply, and consistent rumors abound of food rationing stamps issued by mistake in post offices. If rationing has not yet been introduced for food, that is not to cast out other interesting suggestions to the public from the energy minister, Patrick Jenkin. He suggested that everyone should, as he does, clean their teeth in the dark to save power. When reporters called to see how he did it, they found his house blazing with light in every room, including the five bedrooms and the front patio light.

But the most interesting restriction placed on the working class in punishment for the miners' action is the compulsory ban on television after 10:30 pm. Although the government has warned that television may be affected for some months yet, it has been shown that the cut only saves a miserable 0.15% of electricity consumption.

When the 'grocer' was asked why nighttime rather than daytime viewing had been restricted, he lamely answered that school telecasts would have suffered. He failed to mention that at the time the restrictions were imposed, there were few programs being aired for schools, and in any case, these telecasts occupy one channel (of three) for a maximum of three hours per day, and are, presumably, only viewed by schools.

This fact has added credence to a government opposition claim that the move was made to create "maximum psychological impact as part of the government's campaign to make the miners the scapegoats for British economic misfortunes."

However, the farce continues unabated. Heath's reason for failing to consider the miners' demands for a $17. a week raise is that this would constitute a "special case".

The provision under his phase three economic policy for "special cases", or the treacherous agreement to the trades union council not to press other pay claims if the miners are appeased, has not moved the prime minister to agreement. His "generous" offer to the miners would actually reduce miner's wages because of an increase in productivity clause, calculated monthly on a compound method.

"Wage Inflation" a Tory creation

At the same time, the Heath government continues to refer to "wage inflation", an expression created some years ago, despite the fact there have been no rises for more than 12 months. And while arguments are advanced that the miner's wage rise should be confined to seven per cent, the average increase with police action, referring to the jailing of three pickets for obstruction recently. In addition, the ancient second world war civil defense structure is being given a facelift with a staff increase amounting to 18 times its previous workforce.

Officers being appointed to "emergency planning teams" are preparing for a "war emergency", but will also "undertake the co-ordination for peacetime emergencies".

Police prepared for unions

A massive breakdown in law and order in Britain is also evidently considered imminent by the United States. Between 30 and 40 CIA agents have been drafted to Britain in the past two months, with the purpose of infiltrating "subversive elements" in the British trade union movement. In addition, widespread wiretapping and surveillance of union leaders and prominent left-wing politicians was introduced in July last year.

In company profits in 1973 was 25.8 per cent.

In answer to government propaganda, and its refusal to compromise, the miners decided to strike from the provisional date of February 9, the returns of the balloting voting 81 per cent in favor of strike action. The grocer and his colleagues state they are not scared by these pressure tactics, and latest statements suggest an outright battle with the unions, using police and military force if necessary.

During the present "crisis", a series of developments have taken place to co-ordinate the police and the armed forces should civil disorder break out in reaction to government policy. Few suggest the government is being frivolous or panicky in planning such contingency measures.

The miners have already received promises of related action by railway workers and dockers against movement of coal during their strike, and they have requested a general strike by workers which could last one day, or indefinitely.

Heath has already threatened pickets

Simultaneously, British police and army have mounted a combined exercise at Heathrow International Airport, allegedly because Arab terrorists were suspected of hiding a stolen NATO surface-to-air missile in England. Tanks were deployed at the airport, civilians were searched and identification checked despite confirmation there were never any missiles missing from NATO.

In any case, the deployment of troops at Heathrow was such that if any self-respecting Arab terrorist had wanted to shoot down a civilian aircraft, he could have taken his choice of unguarded vantage points. The operation was unmistakably a rehearsal for police and army co-ordination.

The attitude to the British workers and their reaction to government indifference, the possibility of a general strike and the resources "shortage", all point to a worsening situation in this island. It brings to mind the statement by British foreign secretary, Lord Grey in 1914 when he said: "The lights are going out in Europe..." Service may not be restored for a long, long time.

A shrewd theatrical look at the Depression

Toronto's greatest theatrical successes so far have come from ensemble collage works which give a multi-viewpoint perspective of a social or historical Canadian reality.

Works such as The Farm Show, Under the Greywacke or Sticks and Stones have functioned as human documentaries, imaging people formed by and forming their environment, without the imposition of a political continuum or a social behaviourist definition of their time and condition. The approach has been free-form fluidity and collective identification.

The Toronto Workshop Production Ten Lost Years, adapted from Barry Broadfoot's book about the depression years in Canada, refines the techniques and mystique of other Canadian found dramas and reaches the essence of a feeling for 'the people'. Broadfoot's book is a series of individual recollections and personal stories of the crippling years between 1929-1939. And Jack Winter's dramatized adaptation of the misery, the courage and the endurance of the people trapped in the confusion of the times, creates a flow of their humanity rather than an indictment of the situation.

The forces of ruin, the stock exchange, banks, drought, big company merchandisers like Eaton's and even R.B. Bennett, the Prime Minister, are somehow impersonal and collectively too big to hate. The guilt is ubiquitous, the censure indirect, making the greatest aggression to the victims fall elsewhere — on the child who loses the change from a $5 bill, the only money earned by the father in years; on the husband and wife who eke tobacco or tea out of a meagre budget or on the mosquitoes which become the ultimate victors over those in search of new territory in which to begin again. Even so, the real output of energy is burned in the will to go on.

Caught in the web of economic failure, a grim farmer clutches the soil in TWP's 10 Lost Years.

Using a stark platform set with various non-definitional focal points and an overall design toned in muted brown, grey and beige, director George Luscombe creates a mosaic of impressions, a multiplicity of viewpoints, which fluctuate around and through the stage space and tell the story of those lost years explicitly and expressively.

The group collage, though, constantly shifts back to straight monologue and the single focus of each individual story making the drama immediate, intimate and often heart-rending. The women tell of the injustice of factory piece-work, of a job in which unacknowledged rape is part of a day's labour and of their men losing their manhood. The men tell us of the humility of applying for relief, of hitchhiking across the country looking for work and of pitiful salaries earned from jobs that almost kill with their physical cruelty.

The whole is held together by folk and ballad songs which provide carefully crafted transitions between the various units of the piece and by Luscombe's rhythmic stage movement. The play deals with a sense of time that is as lost as tumbleweeds in the wind, creating spaces which shift from the open prairies and the long breadth of railway tracks to the enclosure of a family home or a front porch aching with a summer's heat and the rot of neglect. But also, more concretely than any other Canadian play to date it evokes a feeling of time past now become a time present, still to be found on the faces of Canada's people.

The uniformly strong cast give us not only the suggestion in one of the songs of "spirits in a restless space who tried so hard that they might live", but also real live human beings who speak to us directly of a stage in our past. The play is one of the finest pieces of theatre to be performed in Toronto in many a season and deserves a longevity as alive as the era which it crystallizes.

Karl Marx vs the teddy bears

By ULLI DIEMER

WHEN I'VE TALKED to people about socialism, I've encountered two very common kinds of objections.

The one is that socialism is too materialistic. You know, godless, atheistic communism, the dogma that everything can be reduced to economics and economic motives.

The other line of attack is just the opposite. Socialism is OK in theory, it sounds fine, but it's too idealistic. It won't work, because people are just too greedy, selfish, competitive, and innately evil. Capitalism is just human nature.

Objection number two seems to be the most popular these days. In the age of universal Watergate, energy crisis, inflation, unemployment, pollution, war, decay of the cities, and marriage breakdown, a lot of people tend to be just a bit less than impassioned in defending the existing social order. They admit—at least to themselves—that they find their home lives oppressive, their jobs boring and exploitative, their sex lives unsatisfactory, sports commercialized, TV insulting, the economic trends frightening, and their politicians hopeless.

But for many the response tends to be cynicism or escapism. Jesus Freakism, Guru Worship, Dope, Booze, The Pursuit of the Orgasm, TV, Relating To Each Other, Hard Work, or the weary conviction that Nothing Can Be Done: these are the order of the day. More people turn to teddy bears for comfort than to Karl Marx. (And even the socialist movement is not above all this: we get our share of kooks and ideological orphans in search of a refuge too.)

SO (THE ATTITUDE IS) it's not that things are good the way they are, but that the system is too big and rigid to change, the vested interests too strong, human nature too corrupt, the alternatives utopian. So you might as well try to get as much as you can out of life (be it money, security, pleasure, or whatever) and just try to forget about the rest. Never mind that in other countries, or another city, or another office, or factory, people are getting together to try and change things. They're just wasting their time: they'll lose, or they'll be co-opted, or corrupted from within.

And that's how the status quo, and those who benefit from it, manage to hang on. If most people believe that it's impossible to change things, then it is impossible, for, after all, it's only when people decide they want change, think that change is possible, and begin to organize to achieve it that it does become possible.

Consequently, what the people with power (whom we marxists affectionately call the ruling class—the capitalists and their buddies in government) fear most is the kind of revolt that happened in France in 1968, when millions of people decided that they had had enough, and that it was possible to fundamentally transform their society. For the rulers, the rising came a bit too close to success for comfort.

It was the explosion in France perhaps more than anything else in the period since the Hungarian revolution of 1956, that proved that revolution was not such a nineteenth century pipe dream after all, that the supposedly quiescent modern working class (a category that includes office workers) and its friends (many professionals and students) did have great revolutionary potential—a potential not far from the surface.

GIVEN THIS DANGER, it is not surprising that a number of methods of preventing revolution have appeared.

The reforms of the 'welfare state', whether administered by the traditional capitalist parties or the social democrats, as in Sweden or Saskatchewan, are one example.

Another is the existence of a mass Communist Party, calling itself revolutionary, but forever willing to settle for minimal wage gains and reforms, while selling out the larger struggle. The ultimate goals for these parties can be clearly gauged from the Stalinist societies which they forever praise, societies that differ from western capitalism by virtue of the fact that only one boss, the state, instead of many, exploits and controls its workers, and by their greater crudity and regimentation.

Labour unions, meanwhile, once the defenders of workers' interests, increasingly serve to discipline workers and integrate them into capitalist planning, while ignoring the unorganized and producing only ever-eroding wage gains.

And if all these methods seem likely to fail, there is always the method of a Hitler or a Pinochet: fascism.

FOR THE MOST part, these methods have been successful in repressing or deflecting the impetus for revolutionary change. (Although the inability of many, many socialists to communicate with ordinary people in terms they can understand, is also certainly a factor.)

The left quite simply, has been unable to convince many people that its alternatives are viable.

Its analyses of the total shambles of present-day capitalist societies are hardly news. People don't really need to be told about economic waste and irrationality, crises, poverty, unemployment, inflation, social decay, divorce rate, crime, ecological disaster, controlled media, mental illness, industrial sabotage and boredom, plastic food, disease, traffic jams, the threat of nuclear war, rampant corruption, about their frustrating jobs, kids/parents, husbands/wives, teachers/students, about the fact that "progress"—material and social—has become a poor joke. You only have to read the newspaper to come to the conclusion that the world is going ever more quickly downhill.

What the left has been unable to do is persuade people that there are identifiable causes of this mass, and workable cures. If socialists could ever persuade ordinary people to sit down and make a list of all the things that they put up with every day, that they have more or less drugged themselves to accept, but which are, on closer examination, insufferable, inexcusable, and possible to change, their ranks would suddenly be swelled many thousands of times over by very, very angry people.

Until people believe that things really can be made better, leftists can hammer away at the exploitative irrational and humanly brutal status quo until they have leaflets coming out of their noses and ears. Or in more traditionally marxist terms, a revolution presupposes class consciousness, which involves both an analysis of the present and a will to the future. And the one does not mechanically produce the other.

THIS PROBLEM IS not adequately dealt with by answering the objections to socialism that are commonly put forward. (Although that's a part of it.) Certainly the great 'battle against marxism' has always been primarily a battle against those who distorted Marx. (The distortions came from his 'followers' as well as his enemies: Marx once proclaimed, when he read of the doings of a school of French 'marxists' that 'I am not a marxist'.) To correct misconceptions about marxist socialism, it is necessary to fight against deliberate falsifications as well as ignorance or misunderstanding based on lack of knowledge and reading.

So it is with the claim that marxism is too 'materialist', a form of economic determinism. As Engels put it, "According to the materialist conception of history, the ultimately determining element in history is the production and reproduction of real life. More than this neither Marx nor I have ever asserted. Hence if somebody twists this into saying that the economic element is the only determining one he transforms that proposition into a meaningless, abstract, senseless phrase." Marx and Engels discussed many instances of what they called the 'superstructure' (ideas, religion, culture, etc.) determining the course of particular events. Thus "History is nothing but the activity of men in pursuit of their ends" and "Men make their history themselves, only they do so in a given environment." And Marx and Engels never suggested that people act as they do primarily out of economic motives.

And as to the society of the future: Marx and his followers have always stressed that their aim was precisely to liberate people from a social order which put humans at the mercy of economic relations beyond their control.

Similarly, with the argument that communism won't work because it goes against human nature, it's relatively simple to point to societies and individuals where allegedly innate characteristics such as greed or violence have been largely absent, which would seem to indicate that these are not inevitable, but the product of conditioning and social structures that breed them. People have shown enough of a capacity for love, co-operation, and freedom that it seems possible to assume that they would exhibit them if they were given the opportunity and motive to do so.

OTHER MISUNDERSTANDINGS are even less basic.

To the question whether revolution involves violence there is the answer that while revolutionaries would like to avoid it, examples like Chile strongly suggest that those who have power will not part with it without resorting to violence themselves, even if socialists come to power by 'legal' means. (It is also true of course, that 'legal' means are stacked against challengers to the status quo, by those who have the power to make the laws, the obstacles stretching from capitalist ownership of the media to the outlawing of radical political groups. Meanwhile, the forms of anti-human violence that go on every day, ranging from the annihilation of lives in poverty to the wasting and destruction of human capacities through boring, brutalizing, alienating jobs, culture, and relations between people, is denied the name of violence by those who define words. And using violence to end that greater institutionalized violence is condemned.)

The determination of those in power to hang onto it at any cost is part of the reason that reforms are inadequate to fundamentally change a society. Of course, reforms are useful, both because they can make life a little easier, and because they can be used, if fought for as part of a conscious strategy, to set in motion a demand for change that will not let itself be appeased with more reforms. But reforms as an end in themselves do not produce basic change. Partly, this is because reformers in power must accept the framework of capitalist society and operate within the limits it sets for instance if the economy is privately owned, then it is necessary to gear economic policy to private interests, or face collapse. Another consideration is that where the emphasis is on change through legislation, the mass of the population will rarely be involved enough to mobilize itself in the face of counter-revolutionary activity. But most importantly, people can change themselves through fighting for change. Legislation cannot.

Socialism isn't as dumb or dull as you think (honest)

Another misconception has to do with the question of private property. What Marx said was simply that "means of production"—factories, mines, transportations, etc.—should be owned and operated collectively, not that people couldn't own clothes or record players.

OF COURSE, THE example of Russia hasn't helped to clarify the meaning of socialism. Many people still believe the claims of the Stalinists to be the "true successors" of Marx. And they attribute the failure of Russia to the impracticality of socialist ideals, not to the fact that a premature revolution in a backward peasant country, under severe pressure from the entire capitalist world, and led by bureaucratic leaders, had no chance of success.

With cynicism so rampant, and the alternatives so clouded in most peoples' minds, it is not surprising that people demand blueprints of any alternatives. (Although they may concede in theory that it is impossible to provide blueprints now for a future that people are going to collectively and democratically evolve as they go along, that all it is possible to do now is create the preconditions for that future, and to remove the obstacles that prevent it from being built). Paradoxically enough, the disaster of the present creates a cynicism that gives more weight to the fear that the future 'won't work' than to the realization that the present doesn't work.

For the left, the political dilemma remains. Objections to socialist ideas might be largely answered by an open-minded reading of marxist works, but—people aren't about to sit down en masse and start reading them.

It's a tough problem: people defend or tolerate the status quo not because they like it, but because they think there are no better alternatives that will work. Reality undermines faith in capitalism even better than leftist propaganda does, but by itself that is totally insufficient. And meanwhile the experiences of everyday life, from work to school to advertising to newspapers—in short, the entire network of social relations—constantly reinforce, day after day, year after year, the sense that what exists comprises the totality of all that is possible. The sporadic leaflets or election platforms or newspapers that the left has been able to muster are little more than proverbial drops in the capitalist ideological cesspool.

BUT THEN, TOO socialists are not alien creatures dripped onto this planet during the Friday night horror late shows. They're people who have become convinced that revolutionary change is possible, but who are nevertheless products of their society.

So it should come as no surprise that the members of revolutionary movements have been unable to completely transcend the ways of thinking and acting that their theory condemns.

Especially pernicious has been the attitude among many that what socialism amounts to is state ownership of the economy, despite the warning of Marx and Engels that such a narrow approach would produce state capitalism, merely a different form of exploitation. With the statist's emphasis on planning and legislation, it was only natural that they should become reformists, dedicated to constitutional change.

The Leninists rejected reformism, and pronounced themselves revolutionaries, but they continued to accept many of the theoretical precepts of their rivals. Operating in a backward, largely illiterate country, they insisted that workers could not attain revolutionary consciousness by themselves, but had to have it brought to them by communist intellectuals organized in a tight 'vanguard' party (modelled largely on the Czarist secret police organization). The hierarchically organized disciplined Leninist party degenerated into Stalinist totalitarianism.

THE TROTSKYISTS, for their part, rejected Stalinism but affirmed their adherence to Leninist principles: they attributed the degeneration of the USSR entirely to external causes (backwardness, isolation, etc.) and refused to admit that the 'democratic centralism' of the vanguard party, with its concentration of power at the top and its lack of other levels of power, makes the establishment of a dictatorship, not of, but over, the proletariat, a much greater possibility.

However, while these movements between them have generally dominated the orthodox left, there has been an important strain of socialist thought and practice—what may be called the 'libertarian left', for lack of a better term—that offers another approach: the practical manifestations of which are better known than the often diverse (and suppressed) theoretical bases. The syndicalist Industrial Workers of the World, the Workers' Councils movement, the role of anarchists in syndicalists in the Spanish Civil War, the Hungarian Revolution of 1956, or the days of May in France in 1968, are all examples. The New Left of the late 1960's was an important, if diverse continuation of that tradition.

Although the New Left as an organized force has largely dissolved, its heritage continues to be felt. Intellectuals, especially young ones, are rooting themselves in the tradition of their libertarian predecessors, and challenging the interpretations of marxism offered by the 'Old Left'. At the same time, they continue to expand and go beyond the analysis of their forerunners, while still reasserting the conception of marxism as a tool with which to analyze the world, rather than a set of predetermined dogmas. They have played an important role in developing radical analyses of many previously largely untouched areas, from psychology to city planning.

The practical accompaniment of this theorizing has undergone tremendous variations as well. Part of the new left returned to organizations of the 'old left'.

OTHER CURRENTS TOOK the idea that change in individuals and human relations must accompany political and economic revolution to the belief that "people have to change first", to the point where they are interested only in their personal lives—a return to the bourgeois individualism they once derided. This helps to account for the fads—seen as panaceas—that seem to thrive today: yoga, primal therapy and the like, as well as more political preoccupation, such as seeing 'ecology' as being the cure-all for all problems. The revolt against the economic determinism of much of the 'old left' swings to the opposite pole, equally ineffectual for bringing about basic change: the denial of the importance of economic relations, the rejection of theory.

Other groupings, while generally holding a more balanced view, tend in practice to avoid larger questions of strategy by burying themselves in quite traditional organizing among blue-collar workers, an orientation that is healthy in many ways, but at the same time an insufficient basis for mobilizing a whole society.

Despite these strays, indications are that there are many people who hold a coherent libertarian marxist perspective who are beginning to resolve their organizational and strategic difficulties. In Europe, groups of this sort are having an important impact. Even in Canada, local groups that have crystallized in community organization, alternate newspapers, and school and workplace caucuses are cautiously beginning to establish links with each other. This reflects a belief that organization should be built from the bottom up, gradually, coming together on larger levels as the need arises, rather than being artificially constructed from the top down, for reason of abstract theory rather than concrete needs.

And the road being travelled is different. The stress is not so much on the abolition of capitalist ownership of the society, as on positive and active ownership management and control by workers of their factories and offices, teachers and students of their schools, and residents of their communities. Older germinal ideas of participatory democracy, decentralization, and people controlling their own lives, are being reformulated as though political stances that base themselves on the understanding that revolution means the destruction of the state and the self-emancipation of the working class.

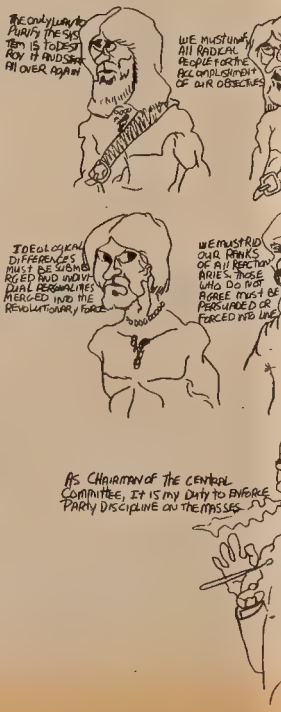

THE UNDERSTANDING that economic and political revolution are a necessary, but no sufficient condition for a liberated society, also leads to an emphasis on other forms of liberation. The women's movement, of course, has been the single most important element in stressing this factor, and freeing the left from its traditional stance that "all that other stuff" could wait until 'after the revolution'. That approach leaves existing forms of oppression intact and thereby removes the most potent basis for radicalizing people—their experience of their own lives—relying instead on an abstract understanding of exploitation and inequality.

It is now more widely understood that as the various components of capitalist society are related, so too must a comprehensive challenge encompass all its aspects: family life, sexual repression, stifling of children, deadening culture, rigid and neurotic psychological patterns, destructive architecture and city planning, food pollution, to name only a few. If socialism means the active and conscious self-emancipation of people, collectively organized, from their oppression in all its forms, then struggle against one form of it has the potential to eventually confront all forms. This potential cannot be realized by isolating its components.

It is only this understanding that can lay the basis for a viable socialism. It means the rejection of the Judaeo-Christian-Stalinist ethic of self-sacrifice for others and the future, and its replacement by an understanding that the liberation of the self and of others are inseparable.

One fruitful result of this attitude has been the realization that there is literature available that is useful in furthering an understanding of various problems, not all of which, by any means, is written by marxists.

THUS, ANARCHISTS have sometimes contributed an understanding of the state, psychologists of repression, novelists of social problems.

Even outright enemies, such as the functionalist school of sociology, are useful to help analyze how the pieces of society, and especially the state, fit together, even if they understand nothing of the dynamics that make them stay together, change, or fall apart.

The literature list that follows, therefore, is extremely diverse. It is possible to learn something from all of the items, but few of them should be accepted uncritically. I contribute this list since much of the literature is little known. (Some of the best, unfortunately, is not in English.) Publishers are not given unless the items in question are not commonly available in stores (of which the Book Centre on Yonge, down from the Cinecity, and SCM in Rochdale are the two best bets in Toronto.)

In the discussion of organization and strategy, much is owed to Rosa Luxemburg, a German revolutionary marxist and outstanding figure in the international movement who was murdered in 1919. Although she often crossed swords with Lenin, they nonetheless respected each other. Luxemburg strongly differed with Lenin's conception of the party. She argued that "the Lenin-Trotsky theory of the dictatorship (of the proletariat) is this: that the socialist transformation is something for which a ready-made formula lies completed in the pocket of the revolutionary party, which needs only to be carried out energetically in practice." In fact, though she argued, "Socialism in life demands a complete spiritual transformation in the masses degraded by centuries of bourgeois class rule...The only way to a rebirth is the school of public life itself, the most unlimited, the broadest democracy and public opinion." For this reason, she insisted on the crucial importance of freedom of speech. She attacked Lenin for applying "the same term—discipline—to such dissimilar notions as (1) the absence of thought and will in a body with a thousand automatically moving hands and legs, and (2) the spontaneous co-ordination of the conscious, political acts of a body of men." While she rejected "spontaneism" the idea that the working class could seize power without organization, she stressed that it would have to organize itself, not be organized from without: "Let us speak plainly. Historically, the errors committed by a truly revolutionary movement are infinitely more fruitful than the infallibility of the cleverest Central Committee."

HER IMPORTANT WORKS include

The Russian Revolution; Organizational Questions of the Russian Social Democracy (also published as Leninism or Marxism?); Social Reform or Revolution; The Mass Strike, the Political Party, and the Trade Unions; The Crisis of Social Democracy; and an anthology edited with a good introduction by Robert Looker, Rosa Luxemburg, Selected Political Writings.

Other interesting works on organizational and strategic matters include Paul Goodman's People or Personae; an excellent discussion of bureaucracy and the alternatives; Gramsci's Prison Notebooks; Anton Pannekoek's Workers' Councils (put out in post-revolutionary Russia, and available from Solidarity, Box 13011, Philadelphia); Gramsci's Soviets in Italy, available from Community Resource Centre (CRC) 3210 Sandwich St., Windsor; Ralph Miliband's Parliamentary Socialism is a good analysis of the failure of Labourism in England. Andre Gorz's Socialism and Revolution is an excellent recent discussion of socialist strategy.

An American group that split from Trotskyism and the theory of the vanguard party, Facing Reality, has produced some interesting literature. An excellent introduction to marxism is Raya Dunayevskaya's Marxism and Freedom. C.L.R. James' book Facing Reality is a presentation of their basic views, including the reasons for their rejection of Leninism. His State Capitalism and World Revolution argues that the present epoch of world society, including Russia, is state capitalism, while his Invading Socialist Society draws some practical conclusions from the analysis. All these are available from the CRC.

Other works on these topics include A. Sotiri's Organizing for Workers' Power (U of T bookroom); H. Draper's Socialism From Above or From Below (from Our Generation); Paul Eltzbacher's Anarchism; Priscilla Long's anthology The New Left; and Rudolph Rocker's Anarchosyndicalism; and Murray Bookchin's Listen Marxist.

GENERAL THEORETICAL works that are worth looking at include Wilhelm Reich's What Is Class-Consciousness?; Dick Howard's The Unknown Dimension: European Marxism Since Lenin; Anton Pannekoek's Lenin as a Philosopher; and even Bertrand Russell's Power.

On the question of the state, Lenin's State and Revolution is still the best work available, while Ralph Miliband's The State in Capitalist Society is a very useful introduction.

Historical discussion from a libertarian marxist perspective are scattered: some of the best are R. Gregoire's Worker-Students Action Committees, France May '68 (from Black & Red, Box 9546, Detroit); George Orwell's Homage to Catalonia; Ida Metts' Kronstadt Uprising; Andy Anderson's Hungary '56 (from Solidarity); and M. Brinton's The Bolsheviks and Workers' Control (from Solidarity).

Some useful discussion of workplace organizing are available, and constantly being added to. Well worth looking at are P. Romano's The American Worker (from CRC); and For Canadian Workers: Lessons From Italy, a pamphlet also available from CRC.

ALIENATION HAS received so much attention recently that it is in danger of losing all meaning. Intelligent looks at the topic are headed by Marx's own Early Writings. Also good are Erich Fromm's Marx's Concept of Man and Bertell Ollman's Alienation.

The field of psychology and social relations is obviously crucial; much of the best work is by people who are by no means orthodox marxists. They include the works by R. D. Laing, such as The Divided Self, The Politics of the Family; and The Politics of Experience. David Cooper's Psychiatry and Anti-Psychiatry is useful, as are some of the contributions of Szasz, Bateson, and, methodologically speaking, even Freud himself.

In some ways rather offbase, but in others quite insightful, are Erich Fromm's The Sane Society; and Gestalt Therapy, by Perls, Hefferline & Goodman.

Reich's The Mass Psychology of Fascism is a very powerful examination of the roots of fascism. Jules Henry's Culture vs. Man and On Sham, Vulnerability, and Other Forms of Self-Destruction are looks at the fabric of present-day society, while M. Brinton's The Irrational in Politics: Authoritarian Conditioning and Sexual Repression looks at areas which he says the traditional left always ignores.

ON THE SUBJECT of sexuality, Wilhelm Reich is the best, at least in his early period. Later, he was driven to insanity and to the theory that sex possessed mystic powers. But his early works are unsurpassed. They include The Sexual Revolution (which contains, among other things, a penetrating look at the Russian Revolution); The Invasion of Compulsory Self-Sex-Morality; and Dialectical Materialism and Psychoanalysis. Also useful are Marcuse's Eros and Civilization and Reimut Reich's Sexuality and the Class Struggle.

The literature on the women's movement is voluminous, and hard to classify. Authors like Shulamith Firestone, Germaine Greer, Kate Millet, Simone De Beauvoir, Kathleen Gough, Doris Lessing, Margaret Atwood, and Margaret Laurence are relatively well-known. Pieces somewhat less-known that deserve to be included Juliet Mitchell's Women's Estate; Laurel Lempus' Sexual Repression and the Family; Marg Benston's The Political Economy of Women's Liberation; and Selma James' and Maria Rosa Dalla Costa's Women and the Subversion of the Community. The anthologies Women Unite (Canadian material) and Sisterhood is Powerful are also useful. More discriminating bibliographies are available from various women's organizations.

On the problems of ideology and language, the two people most worth reading—and both of them deserve to be much more widely known—are George Orwell and Noam Chomsky. Chomsky's Problems of Knowledge and Freedom; American Power and the New Mandarins; and For Reasons of State are all as brilliant as they are far-ranging. I especially like his discussion of why intellectuals—left and right—fear popular decision-making. Orwell's best pieces include Politics and the English Language; The Prevention of Literature; and 1984.

In the field of education, much of the analysis of the 60's student movement still has some interest. I'll only mention Jim Hardin's essay Tragedy, Absurdity, and Joy in the Classroom; while A. S. Neill's classic Summerhill is naive in its understanding of social change, but profoundly stimulating and humanistic.

GOOD INTRODUCTIONS to cultural questions are John Berger's Ways of Seeing and Lee Baxandall's anthology Radical Perspectives in the Arts.

On cities and the environment the literature is again very varied; while neither are socialists, both Paul Goodman (Communitas) and Jane Jacobs (The Death and Life of Great American Cities) effectively demolish the existing orthodoxy. Two works by Murray Bookchin, Ecology and Revolutionary Thought, and Towards a Liberatory Technology, raise interesting possibilities about the future.

Finally, some of the best current ideas are to be found in periodicals, not books or pamphlets. Magazines and journals are generally the best way of gaining an appreciation of oppositional currents of thought. The best are (in approximate order, I think) Radical America, 5 Upland Rd., Cambridge, Mass.; Socialist Revolution, 396 Sanchez St., St. Francisco; Liberation, 339 Layfette St., New York; Transformation (when it comes out); Telos (Dept. of Soc., Washington Univ., St. Louis)—very theoretical; and Our Generation, 3924 Rue St. Urbain, Montreal.

Also well worth looking at are the annual Socialist Register; and The Newsletter (P.O. Box 38), Postal Station E, Toronto) which circulates ideas, experiences, and information among Canadian militants.

A lot of the stores, groups, and magazines listed above have literature lists. Incidentally, which they'll only be too glad to supply, as does Hogtown at the U of T SAC (12 Hart House Circle).

"Messiah?" said the man at the bar. "Aah...they're a dime a dozen." And maybe so, but this is a recording worth having even if you have a couple already. In the past few years, we've been subjected to "authentic performance" versions of many Baroque masterpieces, notably Bach's but also including the works of Handel, Couperin, Telemann and others. All this was a reaction against the quite undesirable excesses taken by romantic-influenced conductors who often "improved" a work by adding more instruments and changing the music itself. While the authentic performance school did have a few points in its favour, much of the music that actually got performed was unbearably dull.

The reason for this was a propensity on the part of historical enthusiasts towards reproducing the music exactly as the composer would have heard it. Since we'll never know just how it really did sound, we can only take their productions as approximations. And to this writer's ears, the approximations didn't sound plausible at all, especially in the case of George Frederick Handel.

Richter has already had a chance to show his skills as a Handel interpreter in a recording of the complete Concerti Grossi, Opp. 6 and 3 a couple of years ago on DG 272204, a 6-record set on ARCHIV. The performances there were light, dry and eminently enjoyable, featuring an ensemble sound that borders on the historical but not so far that it sounds over-reverent or stifled.

And now we come to his complete recording of Messiah, the traditional Xmas favourite. Patrons of the annual Toronto concerts who are not familiar with the original scoring may be somewhat surprised at the size of the choral forces involved. Where Elmer Iseler tends to favour the mammoth forces of the 400-voice Mendelssohn Choir, Richter wisely opts for the smaller John Addis Choir, a tight, expert ensemble that manages to back up the soloists without turning the proceedings into a choral festival. His soloists are also at the top rank of the DG roster, particularly Anna Reynolds. She gives a marvellous performance of the aria "A Man of Sorrows", as well as holding her own in all the other well-known sections.

Richter's overall perspective is one of warm involvement with the music, although different from Karajan's (as best seen in that conductor's recent "St. Matthew Passion"). He is helped along by the able playing of the London Philharmonic, whose even string sound lends a sheen of brilliance to the recording. Rounding out the package is a well-written booklet, with the usual historical facts essay, some notes on the music itself, and biographies of the artists. The most pleasing aspect of the packaging is the cover illustration, taken from Salvador Dali's "Christ of St. John" which hangs in the Glasgow Museum. The vantage point (from the air, and forward of the cross, highlighted by illumination from the right) makes for a dramatic cover, with the whole painting reproduced on the booklet cover. DG's recording teams have provided their usual high standards for us, making this a Messiah to measure future recordings against.

Four Tops sound even more like black Andy Williams'

Motown has moved from the inner city to the suburbs.

The first to make the switch were the Supremes in the late '60s, when they released songs like "The Happening" and "Some Things You Never Get Used To".

Purists noticed an over-all dilution in the sound. The lyrics, too, tended to veer away from the real world into a never-never land. The Supremes had once been good.

Back in the mid-60s, the Four Tops released a series of upbeat songs which all sounded the same, to wit: "I Can't Help Myself", "Standing in the Shadows of Love", and "It's the Same Old Song" (it sure was). All three songs were written by the same team, Holland-Dozier-Holland, that was busy turning out Supremes hits like "Baby Love".

In the intervening period, while all but their loyal fans forgot about them, the Four Tops left the Motown label and moved to Dunhill records, losing the services of the Holland-Dozier-Holland team, but finding substitutes in Dennis Lambert and Brian Potter.

Their new album, Main Street People finds them comfortably installed in a middle-class world where people talk about their "last affair" and wonder if they can cope. Nothing stronger than an electric piano.

This is a world that is almost habitable by the likes of Andy Williams. The interests of black and white middle classes do no entirely coincide, however.

Several of the songs on Main Street People deal in a sort moral uplift which seems indigenous. Take "Am I My Brother's Keeper", whose chorus runs:

Am I my brother's keeper, am I my brother's keeper
Am I my brother's keeper, yes I am

There is also the theme from Shaft in Africa, the group's current hit single:

Are you man enough
Big and bad enough
Are you gonna let em shoot you down?

The songs are well-crafted, the lyrics achieve a minimal competence. But what is there to take away?

Watch out, Tonto old friend. Not all lonerangers work for the forces of good.

If Peter Such had published riverrun in the United States it would have been a very good 95-cent paperback for entertaining boys from eight to twelve in the back seat of the car while waiting in line at the gas station. Unfortunately, however, Peter Such is a Canadian and his book has been brought in a $5.95 hardcover edition by the same company which publishes such authors as Alden Nowlan—a man who has some right to be taken seriously. As a result, riverrun is a very bad book.

It isn't the price which irks me but the pretentiousness. An American editor, preparing Such's manuscript for the new Dell Canadian Wilderness Tales series, would have quickly dispensed with the Joyce epigraph and the tenthousandandtenth-hand Joycean language:

Outward the sea, once untroubled except by the lifting easing canoes of the People. But for generations now it has borne the bruising keels of the gull-winged ships of the invaders. Nonosabasut, hawk-high in his clifftop birch, is witnessing this final evening on his People's last journey to these shores. The sea's churn stills. Its mark is left where all day it has worried the foundering cobbles of this treacherous cove.

This is the first paragraph of the book. Such is trying for the old flick effect: PAN sea at sunset. While credits roll by, FADE in sounds of water and wind (the seagulls come a bit later). Do a slow ZOOM to a figure squatting in a tree on a cliff (of course he has his pants on, you stupid racist pig). But the words do not actually leave one with any impression aside from that of the words. Let us compare the 5.95 brand-x paragraph with my attempt at a goodbad 95-cent paragraph:

Caribou Catcher, one of the last of the People, stared un-moving at the sea far below. His huge bronze frame was perched like a hawk in a birch tree which grew on the edge of a high cliff. He watched the sun setting on the last shores. The brave hunter was remembering tales of the time great ships with white wings, when the sea had been untroubled except for the humble canoes of the People. He watched as the waves grew still, and he saw where the mark of the retreating sea was left on the cobbles of the beach in the Cove of Treachery.

The question which must be asked is whether Such's contorted prose makes the Indian's experience any more vivid to the reader than does the flaccid but unabashedly 95-cent prose of the opening paragraph of my novel. Why does he begin with "Outward the sea"? It sounds like a title Too Late the Phalarope (?) but does it mean anything? Why does he say "hawk-high"? Maybe it's an Old English kenning. Maybe it's supposed to rhyme with HawkEye and subtly remind us of The Last of the Mohicans. That's it. That's it. Now let's see what we can get out of the contrast between the "lifting easing canoes" and the "bruising keels". Gee, is that what they call, uh, uh, metonymy? I mean when the guy feels it himself, you know, and not the thing he's talking about, like as if the keel was a white man's foot kicking him and the canoe sort of makes him feel good. No, Such's prose style does not contribute a meaning worth 5 dollars more.

The root of pretentiousness grows deeper than wordswords, and anyway we can't all be James Joyces. A much more serious objection which I would like to raise against Peter Such, author, is that he does not appear to know what he is doing. Otherwise, how could he possibly have the audacity to write a book from the point of view of Indian people? Peter Such certainly doesn't sound like an Indian name, and the face on the back inside flap looks suspiciously whiteangloesaxonprotestant. By the way, he isn't Indian. The same flap also informs me that Such is a genuine Vic graduate and ex-writer-in-residence: obviously he is far too sophisticated to pay attention to the first grade school rule of composition which told us all to write about what we knew. The problem of riverrun is not primarily a problem of style, but of content: there is no meaning for the words to communicate. I have not read Such's first novel Fallout, flattering reviews of which appear on the back outside the dust jacket. But having read this later novel, I can confidently warn readers of this review not to imagine that what the Tamarack Review says about Fallout also applies to riverrun: "The people come alive, especially the Indians. No lies about them, they are real, but they are presented with compassion and understanding." Perhaps everyone concerned will forgive me for relating a Lil Abner story at this point. At one stage of his career, Lil Abner made a great hit in cultivated circles with his wonderfully realistic imitations of pig noises. Then on the night when he was to perform on the equivalent of the Massey Hall stage, Lil Abner hid a live pig under his jacket and moved his lips while the pig did its own honking. The audience was outraged—he didn't sound anything like a pig. Lil Abner was hooted off the stage in disgrace. I suspect that what Fallout brought to life for the Tamarack reviewer was his own ideas about Indians. Nonosabasut may be Such's rather out-dated notion of the Noble Savage, or his boyhood dream of the perpetual campout (inspired by Archie Belandine in the guise of Wa-sha-quon-asin), but he is not, cannot be an Indian. It is not Such's "compassion" which I question, but his "understanding". Those of us whose ancestors have been in this country for a century or two do seem to feel a special attachment to the people who were here before us. Margaret Atwood does, I think, capture something genuine when she describes the "gods" of the forest which communicate with her central character (who does become Indian-like) in the final chapters of Surfacing. The totem poles at the Royal Ontario Museum do have a particular meaning for me, as do the paintings of Emily Carr—but at least I realize that these things are confused in my mind. I know that I am selfish in my attitude toward the Indians and their artifacts: I want them in my museum because I want some visible evidence of my roots in this strange land. Once, in the name of God, the crown, the governor, I killed them; now, because God, the crown, and the governor have ceased to have any meaning for me, I need them and therefore preserve them. At least I do not imagine that I am not still exploiting the native peoples. Naturally Peter Such and I would yank an Indian child out of the way of a car which was about to hit him. But such an act of Samaritanism does not give us the licence to go out and save all Indians with a missionary zeal. For that (although he doesn't seem to know it) is what Peter Such is doing in riverrun. This book is just a new, somewhat less innocent version of the old missionary twaddle.

Artist-journalists look at an artist-industrialist and discover nothing but their own assumptions

K. C. Irving:
The Art of the Industrialist
by Russell Hunt and Robert Campbell
McClelland and Stewart, $8.95

Timely, pretentious and frustrating.

K. C. Irving? He's authentically Canadian. He owns half of New Brunswick. He owns all the English language newspapers in the province. He owns gas stations, refineries, tankers, forests, pub and paper mills, bus lines, TV stations. He was most recently in the news just a couple of weeks ago when a New Brunswick judge in a landmark case ruled that his newspaper proprietorship did indeed constitute a monopoly. Sentence has not yet been announced.

The book K. C. Irving is subtitled The Art of the Industrialist which might lead you to suspect it's just another one of those trendy "interpretations" of a prominent politician or business man by an English PhD graduate (they've got to do something), one of those non-biographies in which the subject is treated as a social phenomenon, something along the line of Gary Wills' Nixon Agonistes.

And, granted, that's what this book tries to be. And its authors are both English lit graduates.

But the book also involves another shot—yet another—at a definition of the art and importance of the journalist.

The combination of the two—the discussion of the art of the industrialist and the art of the journalist—the combination is fatal.

The preface quotes from A Midsummer Night's Dream:

"The poet's pen

"Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing

"A local habitation and a name."

And it says that although a fundamental difference between art and journalism is that "the journalist has his local habitation and name given to him (and so the book is not an airy nothing), there is also a fundamental similarity between art and the sort of journalism represented by this book....

"We present a number of characteristic incidents or aspects of the development of (the Irving) empire, each presented in more detail than would be possible if they were part of a history of the whole phenomenon. We offer each just as an artist offers an incident; as interesting in itself and also as part of a general portrait of a character. That in this case it is the character of a corporation and not of a personage in literature does not change the basic method of proceeding....

"The understanding that results is an intuitive rather than discursive one—the kind of understanding that arises out of experience with, rather than knowledge about, the Irving phenomenon."

Sigh.

No one asked these two authors to stack the cards against themselves.

This is what muckraking journalist I. F. Stone says about his craft:

A complete description of the Committees and the Rules of Procedure are available upon request at the Faculty Office, Sidney Smith Hall.

"And, I tell you, I really have so much fun, I ought to be arrested. Sometimes I think it's wrong of me because, you know, if you're a newspaperman, as I've been since I was 14 years old, to have your own little paper...to be able to spit in their eyes, and do what you think is right, and report the news, and have enough readers to make some impact is such a pleasure that you forget what you're writing about. It becomes like, you're a journalistic Nero fiddling while Rome burns, or like a small boy covering a hell of a big fire. It's just wonderful and exciting and you're a cub-reporter and God has given you this big fire to cover. And you forget that it's actually really burning."

That's a journalist speaking. A real journalist.

Hunt and Campbell say the value of the journalist, "like that of the novelist or the poet" resides in his opposition to a tide "not of ignorance or apathy but of incomprehension... See, he says, the universe does make sense. It may not be pleasant, it may not even be bearable, and it's certainly not easy to cope with, but it does make sense. It's possible to understand and—in the case of the kinds of phenomena journalists deal with—it may even be possible to alter..."

Yes, sirs, yes, but cant, sirs, cant, nevertheless.

Show me; don't tell me.

There is a crippling absence of professionalism as in professional detachment, professional involvement, professional craftsmanship, professional humility in this book.

A job smugly done but not a job well done.

The journalist as hero. But every one is a hero nowadays.

There is something disturbing about a Kensington Market baker, say, who suddenly begins to post "Save the Toronto Island Community" stickers and benefit concert announcements on his display cases. Is he doing this to attract a certain clientele? Is it a concession to the market then? But are there so many people willing to be taken in? Does their commitment to the "Toronto Island Community" extend no further than to a need to see the stickers everywhere they go? If it is not a concession on the baker's part what about the baker's other customers? Old age pensioners, new immigrants, young children, to whom the "Toronto Island Community" means nothing at all...? There are other people besides the hip young.

There is something disturbing too about a presentation of the journalist as artist. There are people who are serious about the arts. There are people who are serious about journalism.

The baker cultivates a state of profitability.

These journalists cultivate a sense of self-importance.

But journalism as a bastard art or as a bastard form of literary criticism, I don't know... And yet that's essentially what the journalism in this book is since it is dependant upon so much other journalism; so much old newspaper journalism. The style is the book. It is distinguished not for what it tells us about Irving but rather for what it tells us that we never wanted to know:

"Irving sounds more like an artist, a novelist or poet or painter, than he does like a businessman. One does not expect an artist to be able to explain, for instance, why he puts a blob of blue in the lower right-hand corner of his canvas; it is his job to know that it should be there, not to be able to explain why... Just so, Irving cannot explain—and ought not to be expected to explain—exactly why he buys one company and not another; why he expands the pulp mill and not the bus line...."

"The analogy with an artist goes even further. Just as the artist often refuses to discuss or think about really ultimate aims (What is art for? What purpose does it serve in the ultimate scheme of things?) so Irving is the furthest thing from a economic theorizer. To "create activity" to make "good business", is to as close as he can come to the elaborate abstractions of economic theory and as close as he has to come..."

Perhaps not so boring in extract but the hundred and ninety odd pages of it are very boring indeed.

One has a very real sense that these authors are operating in a vacuum, the vacuum of their own assumptions.

I will stick my neck out and say, judging from the content of the book, and the feeling towards Irving that it conveys, that Hunt and Campbell have never met Irving, let alone interviewed him or any of his sons or associates.

when you present journalism as a bastard form of art you don't stop there. It's a two way street. Pretty soon you get theology as Journalism (Harvey Cox), philosophy as Journalism (Charles Reich), literary criticism as Journalism (Jan Kott), even the novelist as Journalist (Clifford Irving). And then you're not getting anywhere. The theology drags the journalism down and the journalism drags down the theology.

So too for that matter — "hypocrite lecteur! — mon semblable — mon frère!" — with today's youth culture where culture is not knowledge but is feeling, is being able to be moved, where politics is not politics but is self-indulgence. Everything is dragged down to one level. And why? Why? No one asks why.

Composer-singers take more care in performance

It's taken for granted these days that most songwriters perform their own compositions. But the singer-songwriter is a fairly recent bird.

There were always a few people in pop music who accepted the dual role naturally, but they were the exception rather than the rule—people like Fats Domino, Chuck Berry, Neil Sedaka, the Everlys and even Dion. The usual situation, was one of performers who only performed, and composers who gave them something to sing about, and never the twain shall meet. The performers were the stars, the idols, and the songwriter was just a name in brackets and small type on the record label.

The change began with the budding of folk music in the early '60's. The bohemian lifestyle was making its presence felt in the media. And for the first time the lyrics were important. They had a message and performers like Peter, Paul and Mary stressed authorship, giving credit where it was due. The singer-folksongwriter was born.

There was Bob Dylan, Phil Ochs, Eric Anderson, Richard Farina and more. The trend had started. The flood gates had just about been torn away. But it took the success of the Beatles to open them completely. After 1965, everyone was a songwriter.

The trend has stayed alive. The days of the songwriter "stalwarts" that churned out the pre-Beatle pop hits are thankfully gone. Today's singer-songwriters are more concerned with musical quality than ever before. Ten years ago, they could get away with a single guitar and a meager voice, because they were, after all, "composers" and not performers. Not so today.

For Everyone
Jackson Browne
Asylum/WEA; $5.29

Jackson Browne first surfaced in the late '60's as a pianist for the simple but melodic framework.

So for a number of years Browne was only known as a songwriter. In 1972 though, he signed with the Asylum label and put out his first LP. It was a mild success due mostly to the strength of the single "Doctor My Eyes" on the charts.

Browne is back again, with a new album called For Everyone. Only this time around there isn't a single release to lure you into a feeling of self-confidence about buying the record. An up-tempo cut called "Redneck Friend" preceded the LP in an attempt to generate interest in the record but it didn't fare well in the Christmas bog.

Most people didn't realize it, but the first album featured a chronological sequence of songs. For Everyone, though, has no such underlying significance. It contains several songs that were recorded previously by other people as well as a smattering of newer tunes. It's a shifting, flowing, melancholic, laid-back gem.

The backup is handled by essentially the same people that worked on the first album. Sneaky Pete plays magnificent pedal steel guitar, David Lindley weaves some impressive guitar lines and drums were supplied by such luminaries as Jim Keltner and Russ Kunkel. There are some special appearances as well. Joni Mitchell plays piano on one cut and David Griesby and Bonnie Raitt and the Eagles' Glenn Frey take turns supplying harmony.

For Everyone dazzles in its precision, right from the opening cut "Take It Easy." Browne has taken a lot of the edge off the song, that was made famous by the Eagles. There's also a mellow version of "These Days," a song which has been recorded by at least five other people. The liner notes credit Greg Allman (who included the song on his recent solo album Laid Back) for inspiring the arrangement. Most songs

Landscapes

Valdy

Haida/A&M; $6.49

Ever since first hearing Valdy last fall, I've thought of him as a purveyor of very natural music. He's not a very inspired lyricist but what he writes is honest, uncomplicated and unforced. He lives on a farm in BC and as a songwriter who writes about everyday life, that gives you some idea about the contents of his tunes.

Landscapes is a nice improvement in the direction that was first set out in Country Man. That album contained what were basically, simple, melodic tunes with a minimum of tasteful arrangement. The songs on Landscapes are in the same vein, but producer Claire Lawrence (ex-member of Chilliwack) has fleshed out Valdy's compositions with more excellent studio musicians and an even defter hand at the controls. Included are L.A. Express members Max Bennett and John Burin, Larry Carlton on guitar and Joe Sample of the Crusaders on piano. Whereas on Country Man Valdy still rounded up some office staff at the studio to sing background vocals, now he's got professionals like Clyde King and Shirlee Matthews behind him.

As on the earlier LP, there are a few original songs. This time the renditions are improvements on those songs — Lightfoot's "Blister Green," Bob Lind's "Road of Anger" and "Passin' Through" — (originals seemed to be included as filler on Country Man).

Hopefully albums such as Landscapes and Murray McLaughlin's Day to Day will help to establish a new standard of recording excellence for Canadian musicians. Cuts to pay particular attention to are "Landscapes," "Trucker's Song," "Christian Life" and "Simple Life."

U.F.O.

Ron Davies
A&M; $6.49

U.F.O. is a magnificent album. Ron Davies, the composer who wrote "It Ain't Easy," a song recorded by Three Dog Night and Long John Baldry has assembled all the elements that make for a perfect LP in U.F.O.

Musicians like the guitar wizard David Spinozza, Wilton Felder of the Crusaders on bass and Billy Preston on organ are indications of the level of sophistication being aimed at. Production was handled by Davies and engineer Tommy Vicari who has been involved with Billy Preston and Hoyt Axton.

Davies has re-recorded his driving classic "It Ain't Easy" and added another high powered tune in the same vein, "It's A Lie." Both are infectious tunes with heavily backed up choruses that feature some wailing by Claudia Leannear.

U.F.O. also has its fair share of ballads. Davies version of "Long Hard Climb," superbly recorded by Maria Muldaur, and even Helen Reddy outdoes those by both ladies. It's something about that airy, squeaky voice and the ultra-natural phrasing. The same formula works on "Can I Count On You" and Tim Hardin's "Misty Roses".

If you aren't willing to invest in buying this one you should at least afford yourself the pleasure of listening to it. Ron Davies, like Jackson Browne and Joni Mitchell, is a good name to remember in times of a musical drought.

Friday, February 15, 1974

This musician may be the idol of millions, but how many know the name of the tortured genius who penned those catchy tunes?

Velvet Underground's lead singer Nico. After that brief sojourn in Greenwich Village, Browne moved on to become a member of the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band. All the while he was still penning songs, which started to get exposure via other singers. Tom Rush was one who was obviously taken by Browne's ability to construct striking poetic images in a paint tone pictures with a somewhat bittersweet theme, that revolves around self-awareness. In fact there are few cuts that stray from that topic. "Redneck Friend" is one and the slightly humorous "Reddy or Not", about the male aggressor being trapped into marriage, is another. It's a fine album and one that merits close listening.

JONI MITCHELL

Joni Mitchell earns her fee at sellout Massey concert

After Bob Dylan's recent concerts a letter appeared in the New York Times to the effect that you had to be offering something pretty special to charge nine dollars a ticket and not be ripping off the people. Only Dylan would draw that kind of criticism, but for me at least, it is a nasty undercurrent whenever I go to a concert. In fact it's the reason I have pretty well stopped going to concerts. The performer may be alright but I can still hear P. T. Barnum back at the box-office chuckling over the admissions.

So, though it is a peripheral aspect of Joni Mitchell's appearance last Sunday, it pleased me to feel that she earned her fee. For years I have been figuring, "for the money I'd rather buy the album," but, good as Joni Mitchell's latest record is, the concert was better. It was longer and tight and full of the musical flights that justify live performance.

By now, if you care about such things, you know about Mitchell's gown and necklines. Her affects this tour have been as dutifully recorded as the Queen's. To me, she didn't seem any more or less comfortable with her latest role than with her previous ones. Clearly she is beginning to acknowledge the sex in what she's doing (as pop singers do and folk singers don't), but she was still reticent and rather awkward. I liked that, though: it was a public awkwardness and not a staged one, the awkwardness of someone taking a step a little longer than she was prepared for.

For all the attention paid to Joni Mitchell's accessories, it was her singing that surprised me. Sincer her last appearance she has learned to use her voice with the confidence and versatility of a master musician playing his instrument. On cut after cut of her records I could feel the strain of Mitchell the singer trying to hit the notes that Mitchell the composer had put down. She would make them alright, but with no slack. Still her improvement has been steady until, on Court and Spark, the new album, she can sing anything she throws at herself and with some authority. But it was at the concert that I heard her cutting loose for the first time, extracting her own momentary meanings from the songs. It gave them the same kind of lift a good actor gives a play.

It is rather sacrilegious to say, but I think the material needed it. Not that Mitchell isn't a daring, serious and unpredictable song writer. She is all that but I have never found her stuff quite finished, never smooth enough to be really pleasing. She can turn a fine phrase ("raised on robbery", for instance) and I think she deserves an award for getting the adjective "cutting" into a song. But then she'll get explanatory ("You go down to the pick up station craving warmth and beauty") or a little sloppy. It bothers when she slightly bends the already rare usage of "spark" or when she changes the colour of masking tape to fit the rhyme scheme. Alright, they are picky little points, but there are many of them and they corrugate her meanings, they give away too much of her structure. Musically I have felt the same: one modulation is brilliant—unexpected—but smooth and somehow natural—while the next will have one step a little too big.

On Court and Spark Tom Scott and the L.A. Express have filled out Mitchell's more jolting progressions as James Taylor did on Blue. (Taylor is, or perhaps that should be, was one song-writer who manages to be smooth and daring at the same time). The L.S. Express are virtuoso musicians and while they cored me stiff as Mitchell's warm up act, they are the most inventive, rich and uncluttered back-up band I've heard. And Mitchell's voice is now more than worthy of them. Court and Spark is her best album, and it is likely to be one of the best of the year.

Her concert was even better than the album.

Nostalgia with The Band

Moondog Matinee
The Band
Capitol

With all of the excitement generated by the Band's current tour with the shy one (ho hum) it seems only fair that the subject of Moondog Matinee is a glance at some of the roots of today's rock scene. Robbie Robertson and his mates take an affectionate look at such diverse memories as Sam Cooke, the Platters, Chuck Berry, Clarence "Frogman" Henry, songwriters Leiber and Stoller, and the prime exponent of their material, Elvis Presley. There are a couple of Band interpretations of Elvis's obscure "Mystery Train" and "Saved" as well as "The Great Pretender" and "Promised Land" from the early careers of the Platters and Berry.

All of the songs receive full treatment from the boys in The Band, with the piano of Garth Hudson sounding particularly crisp and fast. The entire package is a nostalgia trip for the group, from the cover sketch with its Filites pic of a cool auto with a "Hawk" decal on the back (Howdie Ronnie Hawkins), to the old style Capitol label just like the design of the now extinct 78 r.p.m. labels. Moondog Matinee will probably be the last Band album for a few months, as their follow-up will likely be a "live" two or three album collation of some of the highpoints of the current Dylan tour.

Charles Lipton's classic work, The Trade Union Movement of Canada 1827-1959, has been reprinted in a paperback edition by NC Press. The new edition is illustrated, and contains an additional chapter that the original version did not have. The addition, "Canadian Unionism", develops the thesis that "Canada's labour history has been marked by a continuing fight for a sovereign trade union movement," and argues that the battle, far from being won, "stands as a central class objective for Canada's workers." (The new chapter, incidentally, appeared as an essay in the collection edited by Gary Teeple, Capitalism and the national question in Canada.)

NC Press is the publishing arm of the Canadian Liberation Movement, and describes itself as "truly a peoples' publishing house, distributing books on the struggle for national independence and socialism in Canada and throughout the world." Its other titles include Bergeron's The History of Quebec: A Patriote's Handbook; Claire Culhane's Why is Canada in Vietnam?; and Milton Acorn's More Poems For People; as well as the titles of authors less than universally acclaimed for their contribution to human liberation, such as Mao Tse Tung and that kindly father figure, Joe Stalin.

A new album of original songs by The Band should be released any day now. The title will be, Is Everybody Wet.

The Graduate Student Union on Bancroft features something akin to a hootenany every Wednesday at 8:30 pm. Admission is free and folksinger David Tweed is on hand to provide entertainment. Other performers are also welcome. Yes the bar will be open, but you have to be a member, which means that it will cost you $4 if you're not a grad student.

Before you push off for Collingwood or St. Pete, all you lucky travellers, there's something you should know: there's a lot of music going on this ski week, and you'll miss it all if you're ensconced in the orthopedic ward or the sunburn clinic. Us stay-at-home types will be able to enjoy:

The New Chamber Orchestra of Canada, that worthy group, gives a concert on the 23rd in Hart House. Featured on this program will be harpist Judy Loman, in a program of Handel, Morawetz, Ravel, Bartok, and Debussy's Dances for Harp and Strings. Grab your tickets early, this one will probably be packed to the walls like the previous shows.

Music of a more contemporary nature is on the bill at the EJB Concert Hall on the same night, when the New Music Concerts feature works by Karel at 6:30 entertain your dinner guests with a broadcast of Shakespeare's Othello, as recorded by the BBC.

Thursday the 21st harpsichordist Kenneth Gilbert gives a concert in Town Hall, followed on the 22nd by the U of T's own Orford Quartet. The quartet concert is probably sold out as part of the Centre's Connoisseur series, but try the Box Office now for possible remaining seats.

And of course there's the National Ballet, with Nureyev dancing in almost every performance. Their ads say "Good seats still available for all performances" but come curtain time you can be sure that won't be the case. Hustle down and try soon. Happy ski week...

Tickets to R.D. Laing's Convocation Hall lecture a week tonight disappeared as fast as tickets to Joni Mitchell. Since we first started writing about the Scottish psychiatrist some five years ago, his Alice in Wonderland vision seems to have struck quite a popular chord. Basically, Laing dis-equates normality and sanity, revealing a new psychiatric character, the metanoid — some one who is paranoid, only he's right. Many people, says Laing, have a delusion of not being persecuted. Laing is a low-key man, but one with an acute eye, ear and phrase. Dick Cavett had him on his TV show along with Rollo May and Nathan Klein. Cavett asked each of the psychiatrists about Tom Eggleton. Good old Cavett. One said yes, one said no, and Laing didn't say anything. When Cavett pressed him, Laing finally said he thought the error lay in Eggleton's choice of psychiatrist.

Though Laing's Con Hall appearance is sold out, his books, the most popular of which are The Politics of Experience and The Politics of the Family, are available and worthy as ever. Laing himself will be in these parts for most of the week, stopping at the University of Western Ontario on Thursday and at Guelph University on Sunday night. (Tickets to the latter are still available at the usual ticket outlets.) He's closest available thing to Canadian "Academicism" and is interesting in this historical sense. Even as Patton's work moves towards abstraction, it becomes more and more formal.

The Gallery Seventy-six, at 76 McCaul Street is having a show entitled Women's Work, basically addressed to women and presenting work by women from the Ontario College of Art. It concerns itself with finding a "feminine aesthetic," a legitimate concern, but is this the way to fulfill it? Doesn't one have to understand the general, i.e. aesthetics, before one can begin to appreciate the particular, i.e. feminine aesthetics, and can't this particular be fully appreciated only in the immediate context of the general? For the answers to this question and others attend the show and the accompanying discussions.

Finally, the Merton Gallery, to which I should be giving a lot more attention, is having a show of watercolours by Helen Bulle.

theatre

For the reading weak frazzled by literary obligation there is a conglomerate relief via the theatre scene. To be seen, starting tomorrow, is a production called Blitzkrieg at the Poor Alex. It is a play about Hitler and his faithful-to-the-end mistress Eva. Sunday matinees at 2:30 are pay-what-you-can. Also at the Poor Alex is a series of special event theatre nights. On Monday February 18 is a showing of Jonas Mekas's film of The Living Theatre doing their landmark stage production of The Brig. The film starts at 8:00 pm and will be followed by a discussion of the history and work of The Living Theatre and other American experimental companies. Admission is $1.00 for members of the Three Schools and $1.50 for non-members. On Monday February 25, as part of the same programme, is a seminar on artistic direction with guest panelists Robin Phillips, William Glasco, Arthur Gelber and Paxton Whitehead. They will discuss the role and responsibility of the artistic director of a theatre company in the 1970's. Time is 8:00 and admission is free.

Opening Thursday, February 21 at The Actors' Theatre, 390 Dupont Street, is Paul Gaulin and his Compagnie de Mime. The production will include original pieces from the satiric to the tragic in form. Student tickets are $2.50. And around town are Red Emma at Toronto Free Theatre, about a young female anarchist, a not-to-be-missed production at Toronto Workshop called Ten Lost Years (a collective ensemble work about the depression years in Canada and one of the finest pieces of theatre to be seen in Toronto to date) and a highly forgettable, flat and totally undramatic production of Michael Cook's Colour The Flesh The Colour of Dust at the St. Lawrence Centre.

Of esoteric interest is a presentation by the Canada-China Friendship Ballad Troup, a group of interested students and staff of the University of Toronto and York University who perform translated versions of Chinese rhyming stories, comic skits and ballads. The pieces performed are all post-cultural revolution and reflect the way the Chinese portray themselves to themselves. The group will perform in the Mini Theatre of Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, 380 Victoria Street, on Sunday February 24. The 8:00 pm show is free and coffee will be served afterwards.

Coming up on campus February 28 is the next Hart House Theatre production Troilus and Cressida. A stylized and active interpretation of the play, it reflects a college football atmosphere turned into a dirty fight and promises new insights into Shakespeare's love and war entanglements.

Your average culture-lover, like the enthusiastic fellow above, just can't wait from one Friday until the next to sink his teeth into a new batch of scintillating, informative, piquant reviews. But you'll have to deprive your aesthetic palates for a while since there's no Review next week.

rock

Convocation Hall has proved to be a great place to have concerts of late. Tonight you can hear the blues as played by Paul Butterfield and his band Better Days as well as the country sounds of Stringband. There are two shows at 6 and 10 p.m. and tickets are available at SAC, and undoubtedly at the door, for $4.

You can see a rock-movie and a live rock concert together all next week until Thursday. Cin-a-rock features a live music segment with the Ozark Mountain Daredevils and Beardfoot, and a movie called Free that includes footage of Jimi Hendrix and Van Morrison among others. Tickets are $4.40 and there are two shows nightly. The place is the Yonge Theatre at Yonge and Queen Streets.

Goeyvaerts, Alcides Lanza and other new composers. The names aren't exactly household words, but the music at these concerts is always interesting and frequently outrageous, so give it a try. Curtain time is 8:30, student admission just $1.50.

Speaking of the EJB (Edward Johnson Building, home of the Faculty of Music, all you irregular readers), an excellent photo display of Canadian musicians in action has been assembled in the lower lobby, next to the Concert Hall. The show highlights the teachers at the Faculty, and gives us a look at the day-to-day life in the building. On the upper lobby, the Goethe Institute has assembled a sound-and-pictures display on current German composers, which is also worth a visit.

Will Lamont Tildin ever come back? Is this week's burning question for CBC fans. Less pressing matters: Verdi's Attila, rarely heard, is slated for Sunday at 7 pm, in last year's Philips recording. Next Friday also scheduled to meet Percy Saltzman on CFTO's Canada A.M., and Vivien Rakeoff on CBC Radio's This Country In The Morning. Rakeoff is an urbane and garrulous psychiatrist from the Clarke Institute and a regular defender of traditional psychiatric approaches.

The L.A.C. Patton show continues at the Hart House Gallery through tomorrow. Patton is a competent artist, yet not a very interesting one. His colors are murky and gloomy; however, whether this is due to the aging of his canvases or is due to the nature of his pallet is difficult to say. The work of Patton, former head of the Ontario College of Art could be described as the Russian women have rights

By HEATHER SANGUINS
Russian women have legalized abortion-on-demand, and extensive maternity care. For over 50 years they have had very advanced property laws protecting women's rights, said U of T women's studies instructor Barb Cameron.

Describing Canadian divorce laws Wednesday as "inhuman," Cameron pointed out divorce is now much easier to obtain in the USSR.

If there are no children involved, after a three month separation, an application can be made to a Registration Bureau.

If there are children, or one of the participants contests the divorce, then it is taken to court.

However the sole grounds for divorce is incompatibility.

Like divorce, marriage is quite a different phenomena in the USSR. In Canada the legal relationship is based on the woman's availability for sex.

It is more a matter of personal decision in the USSR, and there is another government - run bureau for obtaining marriage licenses.

There is also paid maternity leave of 56 days before and after birth, with possible extensions.

After returning to work, in addition to the regular breaks in their shifts, new mothers are given additional breaks to feed their babies.

Eighty per cent of all Russian mothers find daycare for their children as soon as they want it. There is also an extensive system of summer camps for the child too.

Cameron described the situation of a friend, who while visiting in the USSR, tried to explain to a Russian woman the "battered baby" syndrome.

She found there was no equivalent concept in the Russian language. The Russian woman was horrified and angry: she thought this idea was a lie designed to slander capitalism.

At the time of the revolution 14 per cent of the women in Russia could read. Now they hold 58 per cent of all the specialist jobs in the USSR.

Artistic probe?

By TIM GALLAGHER

Metro police chief Harold Adamson, said Wednesday he would not object to a public inquiry into police conduct during the four month - long Artistic Woodwork strike.

Adamson was speaking to a mostly student audience at Osgoode Hall law school about the police role in the strike.

Questioners asked Adamson if the police department would investigate cases where videotape evidence presented by the defence completely contradicted police testimony.

Investigations are being conducted in all cases where gross contradictions in police testimony have occurred, he said. This involves even cases where the accused persons have been acquitted, he said.

At the Keele Street court Thursday afternoon, William Lewis, 36, a community worker, was acquitted on a charge of common assault. The charge arose from Lewis' arrest at the Artistic Woodwork strike.

Lewis, defending himself, successfully subpoenaed police videotapes of the Artistic strike. This is the first time police tapes have been subpoenaed.

Tax demo

The American Club of Toronto will be meeting again on Monday, Feb. 18, at the Park Plaza Hotel, corner of Bloor and Avenue Rd.

The meeting is restricted to the members who are all U.S. citizens in Canada with an average salary of $45,000.

Most of the members are corporation heads in Canada.

The meeting is to provide the American Club with information on how to get out of paying Canadian income taxes and is an annual event.

A demonstration against the tax night is being organized by the 85 per cent Canadian Quota Campaign. It is scheduled to start at 5:30 pm Monday afternoon.

Gsys protest OHRC

The Ontario Human Rights Commission has shown itself unresponsive to the problems of homosexuals. No action has been taken by the commission in the six months since several Toronto gay groups presented a brief urging research into discrimination against homosexuals.

Other recommendations included establishing an anti-prejudice educational programme, and the inclusion of the term 'sexual orientation' among the categories of the Human Rights Code.

To protest the inactivity of this body, the Gay Alliance Toward Equality is holding a demonstration in front of the OHRC building, 400 University Ave., on Monday February 18 at 8:00 am

Skiers come fifth

By BETTY COOK and GRETCHEN MARKLE

The first day of the OWIAA alpine ski finals at Blue Mountain, Collingwood, took place under ideal weather and snow conditions. The race was a two-run, back-to-back giant slalom with Carleton placing first.

The Toronto team finished fifth in this event. Chris Bagg was the Blues' best skier, coming in tenth.

The second day was sunny and warm for the slalom but it was marred by an emergency trip to the hospital for one of the U of T racers. There were no broken bones but a viral infection did prevent Diana Cooper from competing.

Other Toronto skiers Terry Carter, Margo Hamilton, Linda Webster and Anne Seymour were able to pick up the slack, however.

After the single-run slalom, it was Queen's all the way. Their victory, combined with a second place finish in the grand slalom, gave them the OWIAA championships.

Overall, Carleton finished second, with Waterloo following in third. A late effort by Trent edged them into fourth while Toronto finished a respectable fifth.

In the individual combined standings, Patsy Chalmers (Waterloo) finished first, Jane Reid (Carleton) was second and Kari Lie (Trent) captured first.

Lady Blues in first place

By DIANE WARDROPE
Tuesday night at Varsity Arena, before a crowd of 30 odd spectators (including the referees), the Lady Blues kept their hold on first place by tying York Yoemen 1-1.
York kept two forecheckers on the puck which confused Toronto. They seemed intimidated by those red sweaters around them and would frequently pass without looking.
But Toronto did play a fine defensive game as the shots on goal indicated. York's goalie stopped 29 shots, while Attallah of Toronto was tested 11 times. Toronto just didn't seem to be able to put the puck in the net even though they had it inside York's blue line constantly.

Added to this frustration was York's style of play. Their elbows and sticks in the air could easily have developed into something other than hockey.
Margi Goldsmith skated through the whole York squad to score a goal, which was still an empty scoreboard.
Finally Cathy Stead banged one in from the side of the crease. York's Cathy Brown evened the score with two minutes left in the game.

Squash tourney nears end

By JANET CLARKE
In the winners' side of the double elimination squash tournament in process at Hart House, it was a battle for first place between Law A and Eng I. The winner of this match competes with the top team from the losers side.
Lawyer Sweezy continued his wins by defeating Tipoff in twin 15-13 rounds. Gregory was also in fine form for the Law, downing Miller 15-5, 15-7.
Even though Law had a best of three lead, during the final match between Morrison and Kunstatter, the Engineers finally racked up a win in two games, 15-16, 18-16. Law now goes to the finals.
Battling for the top 'loser' spot were four teams. PHE and Law B were the first contenders. Woods beat Krawec 15-6, 15-8, for the first PHE point. Loosemore got his match by default. Prettie sewed up the set for the jocks with a 15-7, 15-7 pair of victories.

Meanwhile, Dent and Trin A were at it in a chance to meet PHE for a shot at the Law. Dentist Virtue was playing Renald who showed well for Trinity, winning one match 17-16, but losing the second 16-17, and the third 12-15. The Dents were on their way to the finals.
Trin's Ker took Hood in two: 15-11 15-6. It was all up to Tammalsn and Mackay. In two short matches it was over. Tammalsn and the Dents had it 2-1.
In the final game on the losers half of the tournament, PHE and Dent were evenly matched. PHE Prettie took the first of three games, 15-10. But Stranks came back to take the set, 15-12, 15-10. That made it 1-0 for Dents.

Jock Woods made it 1-1 by defeating Tammalsn by an unrecorded score. Dent Virtue relieved the tension by downing Stableworth by a strong 15-1, 15-5 set.
So the Dents now meet Law A for the championship game, February 21 at Harh House.

What in God's name are you doing?

Some guys can go pelting down the Road of Life like an arrow. They never hesitate, never swerve, never even slow down.

But the rest of us get gnawed by these funny little questions. They come, unasked for, unwelcome and usually about two o'clock in the morning. They can stop you cold in your tracks. Samples: Is this all there is? If everything's working out for me, why am I bugged? What in God's name am I doing anyway?

If they persist, if they make you feel like some dim-wit robot programmed by someone else, maybe you should bless the questions, take advantage of the time-out, and think

If you're asking yourself what in God's name you're doing, why not think about doing something in God's name?

Meds hand SMC their first defeat

By BOB PRICHARD

The proverbial story in basketball action last week was "how the mighty have fallen." The big blue St. Mike's machine ran out of gas against Meds A, ending up on the short end of a 72-53 score.

Horemblas hoarded 16 for the doctors while Becker donated 14. Trafford managed 14 for SMC.

That win puts Meds two points out of first place, which is now jointly occupied by St M A and Vic I (St. Mike's does have a game in hand).

Vic earned their position by virtue of two wins over PHE B and Law I. They took the jocks 89-64, five of the red and yellow counting double figures. Eben led with 18.

For the PHE Ed lads, Lorenz muscled 23, while Kelly (yes, my boy, we know you were a ringer) shot 20.

The Lawyers were convicted 69-56. Kastelic got 15 for the winners, while Pirie cross-examined with 24.

The A delegation of the Phys Ed faculty emerged out of last place, thanks to two wins. They wrestled their B counterparts to a 64-44 loss with Quackenbush (alias "Quack") leading the flock.

They then flushed down Sr Eng 73-60. Doret and Lewelin pumped 19 and 17 for PHE, while Gratz and Siskina split 28 for the engineers (and please score sheet!).

In the B division, Trin A added another loss to the PHE B's tale of woes with a 69-60 score. Wright was left with 18 for Trin, while Storey grabbed 16. Lorenz had 15 for PHE, while Kelly (there you are again!) added 14.

In the second division, PHE C took their first dive of the year, yielding 70-69 to Jr Skulemen. Robinson led the engineers cause with 21, while Saracini hit 16.

For the losers, Nedoszytko scored three times as many points as the number of letters in his name. Mehen coughed up half that much.

With that win, Jr Eng moves two points behind PHE C (but with a game in hand).

Determination creases the faces of a Meds and SMC player as they fight for the ball.

Two points behind them are the Foresters, who dumped UC II 66-30. Clark clocked 29 for the tree cutters.

Two points behind them is St M B, who, after bowing 68-64 to Mgt Stud, came back to trounce Dent A 61-35.

Kirby led SMC with 19 in that game, while O'Conner sunk 18 in the earlier one. Mgt rebutted with 20 points for Hertzman.

Dents A had earlier extracted a 65-40 victory from UC II with 19 from Tanisnon.

The Dents hammered PHE D 74-26. Wichert drilled 24 for Dents, while Hornis added 16. Innis beat

New B (as usual) 42-29, led by Rosenberg's 14.

Pharm got 17 from Grillanda to nip Trin B 44-43. Clemes and McRae roused 12 each for Trin. The druggists pulled up another win when the Lawyers defaulted their case.

Interfac hockey standings still undecided

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

Although most of the playoff positions have been decided as the interfaculty hockey season draws to a close, there's still uncertainty about the exact ranking of the teams.

In division I (A) Erindale leads PHE A by only a point. Vic I is still within striking distance with 18 points but should they falter, SMC A (16 points) might still surge into third.

In division I (B), Dent A has a stranglehold on first place with 20 points but there's still a struggle for second. New I leads Grads I by only a point with each team having two games to play.

There is still one wild card spot to be decided, and it goes to the team with the best record. It will be either Law I in division I (A) or Meds A in division I (B). Law with 12 points presently leads Meds by a scant two points, with both teams having two games yet to play.

In division II (A), the battle royale for the fourth and last playoff spot rages between Vic II with 17 points and SMC B with 16. SMC has two games remaining but Vic has three.

In division II (B), four teams have qualified but the order has yet to be established. Pharm A, who have lost but one game this year, still find Scar II only a point behind them. Pharm, however, has two games in hand.

Fourth-place Knox with 14 points could still slip into third but it'll probably take an act of God - Law II leads them by two points with a game in hand.

And now, having given you something to worry about all through reading week, we'll soothe your troubled mind with the actual results of last week's games.

Pharm A continued to tear division II (B) apart, mauling UC II 12-0. Miattello, Wemyrs, Hetherington, Walt (2), Alexander (2), Clement (2), and Billings scored (they sound like a modern edition of the Wild Bunch.) Brown earned the shutout.

Division II (B) leader Jr. Eng downed Trin A 2-0 on goals by Kennedy and Raven (unfortunately, we didn't get any direct quotes from the Raven this time). Topia was the smiling recipient of the shutout.

Grad II met Vic II and probably wished they hadn't. The grads gave those smooth com men from Vic ten goals and only got one goal in return.

The Vic goals were gleefully provided by Boyd, Oscapella (musical jargon for 'one who scores after Boyd'), Tape, Deportier, and Simpson (who seared three goals).

A doubting Thomas scored for the skeptical grads.

Innis I faced Fac Ed and defeated them 3-2 as the troika of Zakaluzny, Walker and Rickets ran wild. The gentle Pedagogs were courageously led by Wakefield and Michahon, but their goals were not enough to avert a great setback to modern education.

Sr. Eng downed Scar I 5-1 in a contest stuffed with 15 penalties. Morem, Showers (but clearing later), Sergatus, MacDonald and Cornell out-scored Scar's Durning.

Scar II got several goals by Tutors and Stewart to defeat the Management Studies crew 5-4. Tepperman, Sparks and Newman were responsible for the losers' goals.

For A frightened PHE B so badly that the jocks never showed up.

Music and New II engaged in a one-all saw-off. Grier made a concerted effort to get Music's lone tally while New's classy goal came from that touch of Mink.

The aristocrats from Trin A lorded it over Grad II 6-0. Trinity's six goals came from Harrison (2), Theodore (2), Higgins and Sykes.

The only Grad II goal came from Rose. (Would Rose score as sweet by any other name?)

SMC A, lead by local ruffians Rogers, Corcoran, Flynn and Borsok, broke the Law I's 4-1. McDonald managed to restore some respect for the law by scoring a goal.

Brace yourself for this - we're going to break it to you gently. Led by Little and someone else that no one knows the name of, UC I captured their first win of the season by downing the powerful Grads I 2-1. Furtin got the graduates' goal but it wasn't enough. (Where were you, Mrs. Robinson, when they needed you?)

The halls of Varsity were not alive with the sound of Music as they defaulted to UC II.

Pharm A shutout Law II 4-0 on goals by Marking, Hetherington, Walker and the Bandy Alexander.

If Pharm's Bob Pritchard had not been in the interfac office at that very instance, sports fans, we might never have known that Newman got a shutout for the druggists. (idle gossip: So I sez to Bob, sez I, when will they learn to designate the goalie on the scoresheet, and Bob he sez, to me, I don't know, but don't be too hard on them, they're only university students.)

Scar II player banks a shot into the upper right hand corner against Knox. Scar won 3-0

U of T pledges attempt to limit parking

By BOB BETTSON

In response to tough questioning from ward 5 alderman Colin Vaughan, U of T president John Evans said Monday the university would reduce the number of parking spaces pending the determination of parking needs.

The response was the closest the university has come to saying it will comply with a city policy to discourage people from driving downtown.

The matter had been referred to the committee by the public works committee, whose chairwoman Dorothy Thomas had severely criticized U of T for its inactivity in getting solutions to the parking problems.

In a long statement to the committee Evans reviewed the history of parking discussions in various committees and tried to explain the delay.

He said the committees did not meet in the summer.

Vaughan had criticized the university for taking almost 10 months just to decide it needed a report on parking needs.

The conciliatory Evans statement was designed to take the heat off the university. He promised to make sure only people who absolutely needed to park would be able to.

He gave as examples long distance commuters, the physically handicapped and those who need to travel during the day.

He said he wanted to clear up the impression the university was not interested in a solution saying if the number of spaces already there exceeded the number absolutely needed some would be phased out, as soon as the number was arrived at.

He admitted there were other problems with night students and employees and those who have to commute to Scarborough and Erin-dale.

Listing the steps he thought should be taken, Evans said the first was the careful determination of need.

Then a series of reductions if necessary together with getting improved public transportation and seeing about the possibility of underground parking structures.

Vaughan said he "welcomed" the suggestions but asked how long the process would take. Evans said he didn't know.

One ratepayer representative said the U of T should not only look at internal needs but at the needs of the whole city.

There was some concern parking reductions inside the campus would make life miserable for the already embattled residents.

But one said dryly: "You couldn't get any more cars on my street if you tried."

Another difficulty Evans raised is that U of T does not control the estimated 600 spaces held by the federated universities, Trinity, SMC, and Victoria. The committee voted to call on the federated universities to follow suit.

SAC vice president Steve Moses said he was "confused" with the U of T policy and asked where Evans saw a phased reduction in the five point policy adopted by the internal affairs committee.

Evans said he was drawing implications from the report. The meeting was the first time a university spokesman has admitted the possibility of a reduction.

The thorny issue of higher parking costs was not dealt with and the committee voted to seek information on the efforts of the other large parking contributors the hospitals, the Ontario government and Hydro.

However Vaughan commented at the end of the debate he would like to see the process accelerated, adding he was "disappointed" at the university's progress.

U of T has already agreed to adopt a status quo policy, investigating parking needs, objections within the university and the possibility of new parking structures.

This policy upset Public Works chairwoman Dorothy Thomas, who in an interview after the U of T policy was adopted, accused them of "moving by the seat of their pants."

She said U of T was not being helpful in solving the parking problem. U of T's 3,000 parking spaces are charging a fraction of the cost of outside parking.

A city parking policy, drafted by civil servants in the public works department, has charged the university along with Queen's Park and Ontario Hydro with obstructing the development of a downtown parking policy to encourage people not to drive their cars.

Public Works Commissioner Ray Brenner laid the blame squarely on the university saying they should immediately raise parking costs and phase out some of the spaces.

Thomas issued a summary documenting the lack of progress. She included the U of T's policy as well as clippings from the Varsity on discussion at the meetings.

There was no discussion at the public works meeting but Alderman Dan Heap indicated to the Varsity he was not impressed with Professor Gary Thaler's statement at a recent meeting saying U of T should not listen to elected politicians.

Thomas recommended in her report the liaison committee immediately begin negotiations on settling the differences with council adding "the university is not prepared to move without clear direction from the city."

She also demands negotiations deal with the objective of having the university comply with city parking policy.

TA's will receive $180,000 in back vacation pay

By DICK BROWN

The Graduate Assistants' Association has won back vacation pay for about 2,000 teaching assistants (TAs) going back to the 1971-72 academic year.

The vacation pay victory, which Simcoe Hall opposed but lost before the provincial ministry of labor, will cost U of T about $180,000 and mean anywhere from $30 to $150 for individual TAs.

The GAA is winding up its recruiting drive on the main campus this week, and GAA president Micheal O'Keefe said the GAA hopes to apply for certification of the main campus TAs next week.

The GAA has already applied for certification of 49 TAs at Victoria University.

O'Keefe said the back vacation pay is to be paid in the last paycheque of the academic year for TAs currently employed at U of T.

TAs who were employed during the 1971-72 and 1972-73 academic years will have to apply for their back pay—the university is not handing it out, O'Keefe said, urging TAs and former TAs to be in touch with the GAA if they have any questions.

O'Keefe said a TA with an average income of $1,000 per year would get about $30 in back vacation pay per year, although he said it is not quite that simple. TAs with three years on the job could get $150, he said.

The university has agreed to pay two per cent of the TA's gross pay for the first 12 months of work—summer holidays do not count if the TA was not employed—and four per cent for the remaining months of work, O'Keefe said.

In addition, with the change in provincial law, any TA employed after January 1 gets four per cent automatically for any work after the first of the year, O'Keefe said.

In other GAA activity, the certification application for the Vic TA's will result in an early pre-hearing vote, either the first or second week of March, O'Keefe said. For certification to be official, the Vic TA's would have to vote 50 per cent plus one for the GAA to represent them as bargaining agent.

While the vote is to be taken next month, the ballot boxes will remain sealed until after the certification hearing takes place.

With more than 800 TAs signed up on the main campus and a certification application likely early in March, a pre-hearing vote for the main campus could come as soon as mid-April.

The GAA victory on vacation pay represents a five-month effort by GAA organizers.

In September, the GAA went to the employment standards branch of the labor ministry to claim the back pay for TAs.

The university administration opposed this move, but in November the ministry ruled U of T's TAs in fact were entitled to back vacation pay.

However, that ruling said the TA's were already getting paid holidays during Christmas break and reading week and U of T did not need to shell out.

The GAA appealed the no-payment section of the ruling in December, providing documentation that TA's were actually working during the two alleged holidays correcting papers and punching time clocks in various departments.

Simcoe Hall capitulated and the GAA recently learned back vacation pay would be forthcoming to those who applied for it.

O'Keefe said the university has agreed to advertise in the campus press for former TA's to come forward, but apparently the administration is not going to do a mailing to TA's who have left the university.

You can't refuse our proposition

One of the three persons above is soon to become Varsity editor. Yes, once again the race is on for campus propaganda chief and the action officially begins this afternoon at 1 pm when the eligible staff voters screen this year's candidates for next year's editorship.

Voting for the editor takes place tomorrow between 9 am and 8 pm in the Varsity advertising office, and, if necessary another ballot box stuffing will take place Friday between 9 am and 1:15 pm.

Those eligible to vote will find their names prominently displayed on a voters list posted in the Varsity editorial offices. To vote for editor a staff member must have worked on eight issues of the paper or on six review sections.

Non-academic code suspended

Negotiators for Simcoe Hall and certain student council groups reached "substantial agreement" yesterday over proposed changes in the discipline code.

The recommended changes will now go to the internal and academic affairs committees for discussion and approval; from there they go to the Governing Council on March 28.

The negotiators from the administration, the Students' Administrative Council, the Association of Part-time Students, and the Graduate Students' Union reached consensus on several points, while disagreeing on others.

Internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway spoke for the administration in saying she would recommend that it would be "unwise and injudicious" to proceed with the implementation of the non-academic portions of the code as they now stand. This means that section D of the code will probably not be implemented at his time even if the Governing Council decides to implement the rest of the code.

Throughout the negotiations the representatives of the students' groups reiterated the position that it would be impossible to implement a code that didn't have widespread student support.

SAC president Bob Anderson said yesterday: "A code that doesn't have the support of the people it's supposed to govern is unworkable and immoral." He recommended to the members of the internal and academic affairs committees present at negotiations that the code not be put before the Governing Council.

The position of the students' representatives is strongly supported by the over 3,000 students (by the beginning of reading week) who had "called on the University of Toronto Governing Council to repeal the Code of Behaviour" through a student council-sponsored mail-in and petition campaign.

However, the student negotiators appeared to take a somewhat softer stand, agreeing to accept certain sections of the academic code, while rejecting outright the non-academic sections. The APUS representatives in particular were strongly opposed to students using essay banks or term paper services.

GSU representatives sought to amend one section of the Structures and Procedures to be applied to the discipline code. Section 16(4) presently states: "Where the jury has convicted the accused, the chairman of the hearing or the Hearing Officer, as the case may be, shall, after consultation with the members of the jury, determine and impose the appropriate sanction."

The GSU recommendation would see a section added to provide for a lessening of the penalty to be applied, if a jury was unable to reach agreement by a majority of its members as to the sanction to be imposed. In this case "the chairman of the hearing or the Hearing Officer, as the case may be, shall poll the members of the jury as to the sanction that each of them would impose and shall thereupon impose that sanction which... is the least severe of those which the individual members of the jury would impose."

However the GSU amendment was challenged by an administration proposal brought forward by internal affairs committee chairwoman Marnie Paikin.

The Paikin amendment would allow the chairman of the hearing or the Hearing Officer, as the case may be, to determine and impose the appropriate sanction, after consultation with the members of the jury. Her amendment would be an extension of section 16(4) which permits final decision-making power to rest with the chairman of the hearing or the Hearing Officer and not with the jury. Both officers would be hired by Simcoe Hall.

Both amendments are scheduled to come before the internal and academic affairs committees for discussion.

Vic French rejects student representation

By MARINA STRAUSS

Students were dealt a blow February 15 as the Victoria College French department dumped a bid for student representation on the body which in practice hands down all decisions on departmental staff appointments.

The department's general meeting shied away from marking milestone in Vic history as the assembly voted down an amended version of a student proposal.

The amended motion would have sat one student, three faculty, and the department chairman on the consultative committee which effectively wields the power on hiring and firing of staff within the department.

The body now consists of four faculty members and the department chairman.

But students have not given up the battle, and are pushing for another general meeting this year. Normally the assembly meets once every term.

A petition is circulating in the Vic department supporting direct student representation on staffing decisions.

The rejected proposal, which came as an amendment to the Vic French department constitution, required a two-thirds majority to be passed. The final vote on the motion was 13-13.

The general meeting—eight of whose 36 members are students—got under way only after it decided in a lengthy, in-camera debate to ban the presence of three student observers from the meeting.

A reporter, however, managed to hear most of the ensuing meeting through the keyhole.

Triggered by last month's firing of a popular Vic lecturer, student member Peter Jarrett (Vic III) introduced the original amendment calling for three students, three staff and the chairman on the consultative committee.

Commenting to The Varsity after the meeting, Vic department chairman David Smith, who had opposed the presence of visitors, acknowledged that if the vote had been taken the preceding Friday, the motion as amended would have carried.

Smith maintained "emotions" were running high during the days preceding the meeting, although he refused to explain why.

Smith stirred away from mentioning the impact on the department of a Varsity article the preceding Wednesday which disclosed the dismissal of the lecturer.

The lecturer has, at present, preferred to have his name withheld. Jarrett contends the Vic department had been in an uproar because of the Wednesday front-page Varsity report.

Since that Wednesday a chain reaction within the various U of T French sections was sparked, forcing Vic to reveal the lecturer's identity to other college departments, Jarrett said.

Before that time, the dismissal had not been made public, Jarrett added.

During the meeting, various faculty members repeatedly made reference to students' "past neglect," as Smith put it, of active participation in the department.

"Why the sudden interest?" queried French professor and college registrar A. C. M. Ross.

Jarrett, never specifically mentioning the recent refusal of the college to renew the instructor's contract, replied:

"Decisions made by the department in the past have been in the best interests of the students."

"Only when things happen contrary to the interests of students do we feel something must be done."

In response to some faculty members' doubts about student interests in deciding on staff appointments, Jarrett argued:

"Politics can be involved when there are or there are not students."

He added "personal politics" are also involved in such matters.

H.R. Secor, the most vigorous opponent of outsiders' presence, considered students too severe in their judgments of young instructors.

Staff members, he contended, judged more compassionately the potential of the individual as a scholar.

Professor Aubrey Rosenberg heatedly attacked student representation on the assembly as "a travesty of democracy."

Students had been self-appointed to the body in the fall.

Because of reading (-cum-ski-) week, four absent student reps had found replacements for the Friday meeting.

Rosenberg maintained "what these people (the students on the assembly) say" is "contrary to the wishes of the students in this department."

Observers barred from meeting

It took a lengthy, in-camera debate of the Victoria College French department's general assembly to come down with a precedent-setting ruling to ban outsiders from attending its meeting of February 15.

Three student observers had come to hear the meeting's deliberations on a motion to sit students in a parity situation on the body which, effectively, decides on the department's hiring and firing of staff.

The observers were forced to leave.

An amended motion to sit one student on the five-member committee was subsequently defeated.

The Friday meeting opened with a discussion on whether the three visitors should be permitted to attend.

No observer had ever before attempted to sit in on the assembly's proceedings and the department's by-laws stipulate no rules on the matter.

By a narrow 11-10 vote, the meeting decided to uphold the ruling of the chairman to discuss the issue behind closed doors. The visitors left the room. The assembly went on to ban the observers' presence from the remainder of its meeting by a vote of 13-9.

During the meeting Peter Jarrett, student member of the faculty-dominated assembly, questioned why "anyone should be intimidated by three people."

He explained one of the visitors was a Varsity reporter and that all three were "involved in the general issue" of staffing.

H.R. Secor, the most vocal opponent of the presence of outsiders, was the first to jump up and introduce the motion.

Secor feared their presence would imperil the "freedom to express ourselves."

Vic French department chairman David Smith maintained it is "perfectly permissible to convey to any outsider the results of our debate," but, added, not "how certain decisions are arrived at."

However, combined department chairman E.A. Walker dismissed these arguments as "entirely irrelevant."

Walker countered if the level of decision-making within the department cannot be seen by any member of the university community, "we should amend our ways of performance."

"Those who care know what we're doing anyways," he conceded.

Walker added if The Varsity was not accurate "we shouldn't give a damn."

Nevertheless, Smith insisted: "I do not want to be misquoted."

No action on Varsity Arena complaints

By BOB BETTSON

The U of T-City Liaison Committee took no action Monday on the complaints by the Toronto Hockey League about the playing conditions at Varsity arena.

The boy's hockey league, which has already complained to university president John Evans by letter, was told the university would do all in its power to rectify the situation.

Aubrey Wice, spokesman for the league, gave the committee a long account of the difficulties the league is having this year.

Apparently they are caught between the Toros and the U of T Skating Club.

They have been denied the use of an essential dressing room and office in the arena because of the Toros.

The skating club has made their playing time later and some of the boys don't leave the arena until midnight, causing an upsetting situation for their parents, said Wice.

U of T president John Evans said he would have internal affairs vice president Jill Conway look into it and try to improve the situation.

However he said he could not answer questions because he did not know it would be discussed, in advance.

The representatives, however, pleaded for an immediate solution until the end of this year's season in six weeks.

Coach Bill Braddock told The Varsity when he approached the Toros they were "appalled" at depriving the league of an office and would like to see the THL given an office.

The committee also received progress reports from the committee on shared athletic use it established chaired by alderman Dan Heap. They are now looking at the present use of university athletic facilities.

Along with this they received for information a report from the residents association on possible amenities and park facilities which could be added to the Brunswick St. site of U of T owned Robert Street Rink and the Central Tech playground.

The committee approved motions arising from a request from Victoria University Student Administrative Council president Brian Gazley calling for the city to clear all paths in Queens Park and improve drainage.

Also approved was a request by a New College student for curbstones on the north side of Willcocks Avenue to prevent parking on the boulevard.

The request for funds will go to the city council after the university makes the request.

Evans reiterated the university policy stating there would be no more demolition of existing residential housing owned by the university except for projects already planned. He said the university would not expand by constructing new buildings but by renovating existing ones.

The response came as a result of a resolution to the committee by the Sussex-Ulster ratepayers.

Canadian laws enough to ensure order

With regards to the discipline code there has been much controversy. The students have voted against the code (those few that bothered to vote), but the code has nevertheless been passed by the Governing Council and is due to be implemented next month.

The RMG and YS have criticized SAC for negotiating with the administration, saying that only the repeal of the present discipline code and no subsequent code is satisfactory. What a hypocritical position!

There can be no freedom without order. The first to recognize this is the RMG. After all, what countries in the world have the most ordered societies? Are they not the communist countries. The reason given for this is that the freedom of the workers is of the only importance, and that they can have no political freedom without economic freedom, and this can only be ensured by the state intervening to route out the "subversive" and "potentially subversive" forces of capitalism. Of course eventually they say that there will no longer be a need for government and it will wither away. But one might ask if 56 years isn't enough time.

However at this time I don't intend to argue the pros or cons of this much government intervention but merely wish to point out that the RMG and YS are not the anarchists that they would have us believe they are in this case, but rather are wholeheartedly dedicated to massive bureaucracy, stifling rules, and endless "red" tape.

For those unconvinced that the proposed "academic anarchy" would be bad for students, let me illustrate with a few hypothetical situations which I believe could occur with no discipline code of any kind.

In the case of plagiarism, if there was no discipline code it would not be a "legal" offence, and hence there would be no body to hear accusations of plagiarism. This would not change professors' minds that it made material submitted academically worthless, and when confronted with such material they would give it the mark that they felt it deserved - 0.

But suppose there was no actual plagiarism, that the idea the student had presented was his, and that someone had stolen it from him 200 years ago. What recourse would he have? If the professor was a reasonable man, as many are, he would listen to the student and possibly reconsider the mark on the basis of the case presented. On the other hand if the professor was not a reasonable man, as some aren't, and refused to listen to the student's case he would have no recourse whatever. But even in the case of the reasonable professor, the student is forced to prove that he did not plagiarize, rather than the professor having to prove that he did. This situation is intolerable, as it is inconsistent with the principles of Canadian justice.

In the case of student demonstrations, it is argued that this is an effective means of achieving legitimate student goals. The example given frequently to support this argument is the case of the Roberts library. Indeed the student demonstrations aimed at gaining undergraduate admission to the stacks was effective, and I'd like to take this opportunity to thank those involved.

I agree that demonstrations are a valid form of protest and should be allowed to continue. Furthermore I don't believe there should be any body to decide who may demonstrate and who may not, as opposed to the RMG who feel that some should be allowed and others should not be allowed this right. Note their position in the case of the Campus Alternative.

Let me make it clear though that I don't support the cause of the Campus Alternative, in fact I find their views even more repugnant than those of the RMG and YS. However

I do support their right to demonstrate and recruit whatever scum that wish to join their ranks.

There is though the legitimate concern with what form these demonstrations shall take. I do not believe that this problem can be left to the individual. Let me illustrate.

Suppose a dozen students become very disgruntled with the policies or attitudes of a particular professor, and decide that they will protest these policies by going to his lectures and heckling him to the extent that there will be no point in continuing the lecture as he cannot be heard. The result would probably be a temporary discontinuance of his lectures, which could have severe academic repercussions if this happened close to a test or exam. The point being: why should 100 or 200 people have to suffer the consequences of this demonstration by a dozen?

Certainly we can see then that demonstrations which are not contrary to the Criminal Code could have very bad effects, and therefore some discipline code which would govern the form of demonstrations at the university must be implemented.

Now the problem arises as to what code must be used. I personally feel that the Conway-Cadario code could be amended to produce a satisfactory balance between discretion and specific rule of law. I believe the major flaw of this code is the arbitrary power that it gives to the administration. I am not against the administration having power as that is their job - to administer, but rather I am against arbitrary power on principle, as no matter who has it, eventually it will be misused.

SAC agrees that the code is arbitrary, but feels the penalties are too harsh as well. This may be so, and certainly it should be discussed by all students who are interested in constructive action, and not just those dedicated to the espousal of mindless rhetoric.

We must not ask the administration to rewrite or produce an entirely new discipline code. We, the students, must do this ourselves and present it to the administration in a finished form with guidelines for implementation, after it has been taken to the entire student body in the form of a referendum. If the administration wishes to make input to our code we must surely welcome it and take it into consideration.

We must not accept a code which is contrary to the Canadian principles of justice, nor must we accept no code at all. This would be inconsistent with the goal of freedom for all.

Varsity doesn't use U's

We have become increasingly concerned about the appalling lack of U's in your venerable paper. We have always been under the impression that words such as honour, colour, and labour have U's in them. In the February 6th edition of the Varsity we were dismayed to see an article on "honors" degrees which consistently mis-spelled honours. For a newspaper which often seems to be concerned about Canadian nationalism and the subtle cultural infiltration of "Americanisms" one would assume that The Varsity would take more care as to how it spells. Are your articles written in American or English?

(Ed. The Varsity uses Canadian Press style for spelling, and the Oxford Dictionary where CP style doesn't apply. CP spells 'honour' as 'honor', etc. We noticed you used the word 'misspelled'. Oxford and CP use - accurately - 'mis-spell'. 'Misspelled' is from Webster's Dictionary and is an American usage of the word.)

Library worker: U of T exploits own members

I would like to offer my support of the letter from a part-time student worker at Sigmund Samuel library. It seems to me criminal that the university community should be actively engaged in exploiting its own members. Its quite all right to raise our fees to levels which force us to take part-time work, but its another matter entirely to pay us a fair wage.

Everybody knows that $1.85 an hour is a rip-off wage, and accepted by students' only because they have no choice. For the university administration to use the same shoddy tactics as society at large to capitalize on the fact that students have to work in order to support themselves is pretty disheartening, to say the least.

RMG responds to SAC 'opportunists'

Responding to the charges, distortions, and inanities that emanate from SAC, in the pages of the Varsity, is usually a tediously uncreative chore. But SAC's attempts, through Messrs. Anderson, Gregory, and Moses, to transfer the blame for its political failure in the discipline code struggle to the RMG ("Leftist Sects Alienate Students", February 13) cannot go unanswered.

First, to deal with the question of negotiations with the administration: negotiations are a tactic to which we are not in principle opposed. But tactics generally flow from a strategy—they operate to serve a purpose, which is at issue here. We don't claim that "the Committee to Repeal the Discipline Code" was undermined when SAC members joined representatives from the other central student councils on campus in discussions with the U of T administration about the code.

We do claim that it was the ambiguity of SAC's demands, and the content of the negotiations, that undermined the committee and the campaign for repeal. We opposed these negotiations because students were entering them with publicly unclear positions (repeal/alternative code/amended Conway-Cadario code/postponement of the decision, and so on) and were privately accepting the administration's ground rules and framework for the operation of a repressive apparatus. A position of public weakness, combined with secretive opportunism, is hardly the appropriate vantage for negotiations. In fact, it was this state of affairs that so undercut and limited the mobilizations against the threatened code, not political 'posturing' by any left grouping.

Most students were not exposed to the debates in the repeal committee. They were exposed to SAC's Christmas mailing, to its brochures, posters, and infrequent public meetings.

The results speak volumes for SAC's strategy, though admittedly the level of activism on the campus wasn't high to start with.

Further, it's no surprise to us that SAC has back-tracked to a rather incredible two-stage program: one for the 'long run' (to be intellectually reflected upon), and one for the 'short run' (which grants the administration a disciplinary tribunal—a foot in the door). Opportunism feeds betrayal.

But, guess what's missing? The demand for repeal of the Conway-Cadario Code, of course. A function of SAC's tactical flexibility, no doubt.

The RMG fought consistently for political clarity in the discipline struggle. The central student organizations and the U of T Communist Club (CP) denied this to the campaign by being nominally for repeal and actually for another code. They probably would have had more numerical mobilizational success organizing a 'committee to support the code' had they wished. At least there would have been no doubt as to where they stood.

To give any meaning to the demand 'repeal the code', it must not be subordinated to another goal, explicit or implicit, (e.g. an amended academic code).

Repeal, as an unconditional objective, was the only viable basis of unity for the coalition of forces opposed to the code. SAC and the CP-led GSU repeatedly violated this basis, and sought to glance over the importance of their violations by demanding political silence and organizational fealty from ourselves and the YS, and anyone else who may have disagreed with what SAC was hell-bent on doing anyway.

When we objected to this process, and demanded political discussion, after having already helped to reorganize and staff the petition literature tables and having participated in the canvassing, the SAC-CP small majority on the committee proved to be the 'obstructionist' force, wasting our time, as well as theirs. Like spoiled children, they offered to 'play with us' only so long as we would do the shit work by their rules, while they'd merrily continue selling out what was at stake.

Patience, on our part, with this absurdity was the only enduring quality of the committee. When that ran out, dissolution was overdue, despite the sad plights of the YS.

On looking back, we don't apologize in the least for our 'line', or for the fact that we had a 'line'. Our political positions are the products of verifiable analysis, flowing from an understanding of the nature of the university institution and of the situation more generally that calls for repressive enabling legislation, from the perspective of the state.

We will re-argue, at every opportunity, that given the function of the university in class society, collaboration with the authorities in the areas of discipline and administration, or any others for that matter, leads to a political death trap for those interested in change. To the ostensible 'marxists' around SAC, like Mr. Gregory, we reiterate—No to any Code, though still not the minimum basis of unity for students, faculty and campus workers opposed to the code, is the only position consistent with the scientific methodology (that you would claim to practice) that can educate the forces necessary for the struggles of the future.

Despite all its anti-Leninist 'line' baiting (which is really just red-baiting, poorly disguised), SAC has a line too: it usually corresponds to what the opportunists (that were elected solely to administer a student treasury) think they can get away with, given their liberal conceptual framework for the achievement of social change.

Unfortunately, SAC's line, twists and turns included, is leading to a king-sized defeat on this question.

More open, public debate on 'line' among politically non-aligned students, and less baiting (which only cuts across potential unity) and less back room negotiating (which only leaves people wondering what they're really fighting for) might have charted a better course for this sorry struggle. But the SAC leadership refused to take up our challenge for a debate, time and again. That challenge still stands, should they summon the integrity and self-confidence to respond.

At this point, only a strong united effort, in the context of freedom of criticism and independent propaganda for all, directed towards unconditional repeal of the Conway-Cadario Code, can succeed in stemming the potentially repressive tide.

On this basis, we hope to join with others to mobilize for the crucial March Governing Council meeting.

False data is objectionable

Once again, the faulty logic of James P. Hull has inspired me to a spurt of literary composition. It seems that he is upset by the lack of tolerance exhibited by his letters concerning the virtues of South African apartheid. Whether it is due to a lack of perception or an intentional avoidance of the real crux of the issue is not clear but it seems obvious that Mr. Hull has missed the point of a previous letter of opposition. It was not the printing of an opinion conflicting with my own with which I was so incensed but rather the oblique use of erroneous data in proselytism of the values of this opinion.

Judgements should, indeed be made with full awareness of the relevant pros and cons of any matter. Consequently, use of fallacious arguments precludes any sort of accuracy in the formulation of such judgements. Mr. Hull's failure to produce any accurate data to support his opinions thus render them virtually useless in the intelligent "unimpeded search or truth" with which he is apparently so concerned.

Perhaps Hull's reluctance to "continue the battle of the decimal point" is a function of the constancy with which his 'facts' have been soundly refuted. By desisting from manifesting further fabrications for use in the discussion of South Africa, Hull could ostensibly offer us an opinion which could be incorporated into our analysis of the situation. As it stands he has added nothing positive to the discussion, but has merely provided material for refutation.

Until such an amelioration of tactics occurs, I maintain that The Varsity should not remain a platform for propaganda.

Keep cars off the grass

Since you appear to be on excellent terms with Alder (person) Dorothy Thomas and of similar mind with respect to the desirability of cutting back on parking on the St. George Campus, perhaps you could use your good offices with her to make a small start in the direction of a campus world safe for pedestrians—set the university an effective example, so to speak, with respect to a practical course of restriction.

I would draw your attention to the deplorable condition of the wide boulevard on the north side of Willocks Street between Huron and Spadina. To the best of my knowledge that boulevard strip was sodded almost two years ago by the university, having obtained the appropriate city approvals since the property belongs to the city. All to no avail. Absence of concrete bumper guards along the curb makes parking on the grass very easy, so easy that 30 to 40 cars get parked there four nights a week, (to say nothing of catering trucks and miscellaneous cars during the daytime hours).

It would appear that grass finds difficulty growing given such treatment and only mud seems to flourish. Some of the more enterprising parkers actually use the public sidewalk, and the path leading to the New College Library. I assume they save their shoes that way.

Perhaps you could find a moment to acquaint Ms. Thomas with the possibility of striking a city blow against cars in the heart of their university haven. After all, even if the university were to close all of its lots for good—tomorrow—there would be nothing to prevent determined motorists from parking on city property in our midst; not even a few concrete bumper guards.

It's not nearly so grand or significant a project as doing in the thousands of parking spaces controlled by the university, and far less enlightened than doubling the parking rates, but we at New College would surely be grateful if you could use your combined influence to bring it about.

New Bio course isn't alienating

The recent SAC pamphlet on university tenure and promotion policy ("The university continues to fire some of its best teachers"), contains a highly misleading statement about the new biology course, biology 110, jointly sponsored by the departments of botany and zoology.

We would like to correct some of the misconceptions to which it may lead. The statement is: "First year classes in psychology and biology are being conducted by tape recorders; many students resent this technique and feel alienated from the courses." It is true that tape recorders are used in biology 110; however, they are used for only 50 per cent of the course material, and then only for the basic factual material. Furthermore, the basic part of the course also includes bi-weekly, one-hour oral evaluations/tutorials with groups of no more than six students per teaching assistant, surely less "alienating" than large final exams or term tests. The remainder of the course is devoted to projects and advanced topics that do not involve the use of tape recorders.

Although "many" students are claimed to resent this technique (are there any teaching techniques that are not resented by some?), a recent (December 1973) questionnaire to biology 110 students showed that, of the random 300 students polled, 59 per cent of the class liked the technique, 24 per cent were neutral, and only 17 per cent expressed dislike. Similarly, only 18 per cent of the class responded that they would prefer a biology course with conventional lectures and laboratories.

Details of our questionnaire will gladly be provided to the authors of the pamphlet, or any others interested, and would have been had we been asked.

More serious in our minds than the factual distortion contained in the statement, is the implied accusation that the development of biology 110 was simply a device to lessen professors' responsibility for teaching first year students. We are sorry that none of the authors came to try to determine our actual motivations and reasons. In fact, a group of professors from the two departments have invested a major part of two and a half years, including two complete summers (the only time which many professors can normally devote to their research), in an attempt substantially to improve the quality of teaching and learning in a large first-year course.

Moreover, we believe that the 27 professors and more than 100 graduate students and senior undergraduate supervisors interact more closely and personally with the 2,000 students who take this course than would be possible with any other teaching method.

We are encouraged by the response of the majority of biology 110 students; we can only be discouraged in striving for the very goal which the authors of this pamphlet presumably want, namely an improved quality of teaching/learning, by such uninformed and misleading statements as the one contained in the pamphlet.

Fewer Varsities will save trees

Every time that I see a copy of the Varsity I become quite sad. I think that you should be sad also. Doesn't it make you ill just to think about all those trees that are destroyed just so you can print the Varsity? Considering that we are being constantly reminded to assess the 'ecological impact' of our actions, I am surprised that you permit yourselves to continue in this needless destruction of Nature.

However, as I am sure that you will be able to convince yourselves that some good must come from the Varsity permit me to offer two suggestions intended to lessen your wanton misuse of nature. Firstly, reduce publication to only twice a week, say Tuesday and Friday. This would have two virtues. It would reduce the amount of paper required by your printer by at least one-third, and it would enable your writers to spend more time thinking about what they're writing. There can be no doubt that the latter would noticeably improve the quality of the Varsity. Secondly, print fewer copies. It is surely not necessary for everyone in the world to possess their own private copy of your newspaper. To paraphrase the British, "Read a copy with a friend". I offer this second suggestion only as a result of my having seen many un-bundled piles of the Varsity lying about on Tuesdays and Thursdays.

I hope that you will accept these suggestions as graciously as they are offered.

Rankin calls it a 'godsend'

BIU increase a $2 million bonanza for U of T

The Ontario government has announced a seven per cent increase in the basic income unit paid to Ontario universities in 1974-5. And at Simcoe Hall they are jumping with joy.

The money might even go to the library for the purchase of new books.

Vice President' Business affairs Alex Rankin couldn't contain his enthusiasm at the estimated $2,000,000 for U of T next year. He called it a "godsend." "It was rather unexpected. Thank God for it," he exclaimed.

Rankin was reacting to what is a bureaucratic's dream, an unexpected budget increase with no strings attached. Under questioning Rankin conceded the money would be logical for the financially poor library.

In a late parting Christmas present to the universities, Jack McVie, now minister without portfolio is also handing out an extra $6,155,000 in supplementary grants to the financially troubled universities and $2,795,000 for bi-lingual programs.

Rankin told The Varsity it would be up to the budget committee and chairman Don Forster to determine how the money was spent. The committee is composed of the presidents and some members of the Governing Council.

Ranking said the actual increase not budgeted for would be only 2.1 per cent because the university had already been told there would be a five per cent increase.

The new basic income unit will be $1,955 per student. The formula provides U of T with over 56,000 BIUs and that adds up to a total in money from the province of $91,053,310 plus the new increase.

The total U of T budget was estimated by Rankin at more than $150,000,000 for next year.

Rankin said the present tight budgetary situation has resulted in extensive cuts while trying to accommodate a ten per cent increase in faculty salaries.

He called the previous BIU totally inadequate but seemed quite happy with the increase.

SAC president Bob Anderson, also pleased U of T is getting a little extra money had some other suggestions of what might be done with $2 million.

He said interdisciplinary studies and other programs which are small and innovative frequently in the past have been squeezed financially.

He suggested some of the extra money go to them.

But he had no real objection to part of the money heading over to the Robarts Library provided it was used for the purchase of books and to hire sufficient staff for longer library hours.

"But I assume he (Rankin) has plans for the money, but he's just not saying what they are," Anderson said.

Anderson threw out the idea of more money for the advisory bureau, which has had funds cut back, or possibly some of the money put into the proposed athletic complex adjoining the Benson Building.

Sexist campaign works

NEW YORK (LNS-CUPI) — If National Airline's "Fly Me, I'm Cheryl," wasn't enough for you, get ready for Continental Airline's new slogan "We Really Move Our Tail For You."

According to the Los Angeles Times, Continental claims that its multi-million dollar Madison Avenue and campaign conveys the idea that all employees — pilots, mechanics, chefs — are hustling on behalf of passengers. However, the company has acknowledged that National's "Fly Me" campaign and resulting 19 per cent increase in passenger growth in 1972 (compared to overall industry growth of 10 per cent) had a good deal of positive influence.

"We're sure going to make a noise in the marketplace," boasted Continental's senior vice-president of marketing Charles A. Bucks about the new slogan.

Not all of Continental's stewardesses are as excited about the campaign. "We've been fighting this image for a long time," said Polly Musch, "and now we're expected to defend ourselves from the playboy passengers when basically we're there for safety."

The stewardesses maintain that they definitely will bear the brunt of customer response to the "promise of thrills in flight" as one woman put it. Why else would Continental offer the women a choice of snappy re-joiners in its introduction of the new campaign as well as a monthly contest for the best reply from an employee?

A suggested answer to the passenger who asks "will you move your tail for me?" is "why, is it in your way?"

A second answer was offered in a film at the campaigns introduction by a stewardess featured in the TV commercials "You bet your sweet ass I will."

UK Tories blasted

LONDON CUP — The British National Union of Students has accused Prime Minister Heath's Tory government of "disastrous policies directly and deliberately aimed at producing a confrontation with the labour movement."

1. The current economic crisis' the student organization said, "Is due not to the fuel situation nor to the attempts of the trade union movement to defend and increase the living standards of their members."

It is due rather to the current crisis of world capitalism, according to the students, and the Conservative government deliberately made this economic failure worse in Britain.

The students say the "Counter Inflation Act," phase three of the Industrial Relations Act and the three day lock out policy combined with massive cuts in public expenditure were designed to reduce the real living standards of the working people of Britain and create a crisis situation.

Erindale professor Gary Thaler did a turnabout Thursday when he withdrew his motion in Governing council calling for an investigation into alleged racist teachings in the Faculty of Medicine.

SFU bans smoking

BURNABY (CUP) — A campaign to establish a non-smokers cafeteria has resulted in the banning of the use of tobacco in all Simon Fraser eating spots.

In response to a petition of five hundred names, collected in two days, the Food Services Committee has agreed to place no-smoking signs in all cafeterias. However, enforcement will be left up to the students as there is no code of discipline for law breakers at Simon Fraser.

Valerie Silber, campaign organizer said "smoking is violating the rights of others to breathe the clean air. A person who is not smoking is not imposing any discomfort on others."

Although the petition had asked for only one cafeteria to be free of the foul weed, it was felt the smokers should be the ones who should be applying for a special cafeteria. "Why" asks Silver, "should the non-smokers have to plead for something which is essentially a right?"

To enforce the rule, offenders are to be asked first to extinguish the fag and then denounced publicly to force the criminal to mend his/her errant ways.

Ohter suggestions to help enforce the clean air program include hanging pictures of cancerous lungs in the cafeterias to kill smokers' appetites.

Beyond Freud: even an egg can think says R. D. Laing

"Spaceship Egg, this is Mother Soil. We are prepared for your docking. Proceed with care and watch our for a hard beach-head landing."

Another space saga spun out for science fiction freaks? No, not really . . .

However, to some people who 'caught' Scottish psychoanalyst R. D. Laing's 'act' at Convocation Hall Friday evening, this is one way of symbolizing part of his 'new' theory.

Laing was speaking of a micro-political, psychological action in this case—the implantation of a fertilized egg in the womb of "mother soil" of its mother after a long journey down the fallopian passageway.

He was attempting to surpass Sigmund Freud's argument that a person's emotional life is created in the first five years of his human existence. Laing argued that "it seems increasingly improbable that our psychological life begins in bits and pieces some time after we are born." Rather, Laing presented the hypothesis that life and, indeed, memory, begins with implantation of the egg in the womb.

(When asked in the question period his opinion on abortion Laing smiled but remained silent.)

Psychic and psychological

Laing initially stated a person's psychic life is "co-extensive with our biology" (our human life cycle), saying that he came to feel what he did about his own life in conjunction with a number of other experiences.

Psychology, he added, "presents a picture of our psychic life developing from birth and maturing into adult life continuing to death. About 20 years ago my own experience led me to consider that (psychological interpretation) doubtful."

While essentially discounting Freud's view of psychology and psychiatry, Laing did admit, however, that "Freud represents a landmark in our contemporary human consciousness. He opened up for us the world of childhood. You couldn't quite call it a scientific discovery, but as Freud said himself, the 'reawakening of memory'."

However, what Freud felt to be a crisis around the age of five in a human being—when reciprocal and negating feelings come to a head—Laing argued that "in fact this is an end product of history that takes us back to the years before that."

He later added, "Life has a history that far antedates our conception, let alone our birth." Laing then attempted through a visual slide presentation to demonstrate his basic hypothesis—or at least what he felt was the logical extension of it.

remarking that "one of the reasons I went into medicine was to learn the facts of life," he demonstrated through the use of visual aids how the sperm moves up the fallopian tube, a travelling distance he compared to the width of "the Atlantic Ocean" for the sperm.

In the ovary the sperm made contact with an unfertilized egg, and then sent it on its merry way. The fertilized egg, "wafted, flew," etc. down the tube until such a stage in the human life cycle when (somewhere between the seventh and eighth day of conception) it first makes contact with human soil, enters the lining of the womb and skins into it.

What then happens, Laing believes—what that sphere is in touch with—is represented in our memory forever. On first contact with mother the egg is either received with love and warmth or it's a "beach-head landing." He added: "This can be thought of (memory) or felt, either one way or the other."

However, while the nine months—"eons and eons of time"—between implantation and eventual birth are peaceful, "birth is turned into a psychological and physical disaster of the first magnitude."

We strangle our children

Laing attacked modern methods of birth, coming out in favor of natural childbirth in all sense of the word.

He said, "We will be remembered—as the people who strangled their children babies—within seconds of birth."

The first thing we do, he continued, was cut the umbilical chord. "the one main line to everything that keeps us going... When we cut that chord under the circumstances in which we cut it, this seems to be more extreme than if someone pounced on us and cut our aorta. Once we are cut off from our trunk and roots we are picked up and taken to a table, a tube is put down our throats and we have tissue sucked out and find ourselves being blown up into the top of our heads where we stay for the rest of our lives... All that so-called 'normal' stuff takes a lot to get over."

When asked in the question period to draw the line between natural and unnatural birth, Laing said that "the whole process of childbirth in some places is conducted unnaturally."

"The right time," he added, "for the birth of a baby in the womb is determined by a hormonal signal that inaugurates labor in the mother. If that's hindered, the timing becomes unnatural in terms of the social process."

"The mother goes to a place where the nursing staff is coming or going off—day shift or night shift—there's a fragmentation of care, a depersonalization of care. The estrangement of plucking up the mother from where she is (the home) is all unnatural."

However, the birth process in much of the world is controlled chemically, "intravenously."

"I don't see any reason why natural childbirth should occur in a hospital; it's the last place I'd want to be born in," Laing said to the applause of the over 1,500 people in Convocation Hall.

"In China they have birth places.... where all the technology can be put in the woodwork and called upon as back up. A hospital," he said, "is where hospitality is supposed to be accorded."

"Why is a woman's pubic hair shaved off at the birth of a child? There is no medical reason, no rational justification. The umbilical chord phases itself out and is then snipped off," in other societies. "I don't believe nature's waited for the advent of scissors and string."

Why is "acid solution" dropped into the eyes of new-born babies?

"Because it's thought the mother might have gonorrhea. It's a piece of utter impertinence that ought to be stopped immediately!" (More applause.) If any doctors were present in the audience, not a single one defended existing medical practices.

Laing's "evidence"

The evidence to back up Laing's assumptions and hypothesis are based on psychological-psychiatric experimentation rather than purely medical evidence in the clinical sense. He failed to explain where the present ideas of birth evolved from and, more important, why they exist.

Instead, as background to his denunciation of "unnatural" childbirth Laing said he had been led to his conclusions "from my own memory... and the memories of other people, who, without any prompting on my part have tried to explain to me how they have felt about these matters. These people are diagnosed as psychotic, schizophrenic, mad, crazy, etc."

"I've often been told by people that they've never been born. They have been physically born but never born in a psychological sense—a profound psychological metamorphosis hasn't somehow happened."

"There are also those who have partially been born, but never quite made it coming to terms with this world and have never been reconciled to this world. They've found themselves pitched back, or have done their best to get back to that state of mind they feel they were in before they were born. People often breakdown in what is demanded in the external world and revert to a state of affairs viewed with alarm and unintelligence. What they revert to is a fetal or even embryonic state of mind."

People in this state "are looking for a place to crash—a place in a context, a framework a womb where a process of incubation is allowed to occur, where there's a chance a fragmented, dislocating state of mind might be allowed to heal."

"The treatment," Laing added, "means not interfering with the healing."

Here Laing's words joined with his ideas expressed in his writings. In his The Politics of Experience, Self and Others, Sanity, Madness and The Family, he has argued there is a close causal connection between the mental disorder a person experiences and the particular socio-economic order in which he lives.

Laing views the anti-helping kind of hospital as the kind of place that would serve essentially as a shelter or sanctuary, where schizophrenics, rather than being impeded in psychiatric treatment would be able to undergo unhindered, the regenerative process.

Friday night Laing reiterated this theme, saying these people "feel what they need is a chance to go back to wherever it was the dislocation, fracture of the psychological and biological cycle occurred, and move forward from that in a parabolic form."

However, as Laing himself said: "Please don't believe anything because I say so. I'm simply putting to you something that would seem to be more probable than improbable, based on my own experience."

Governing Council 'democracy' hits a few snags

By ART MOSES

Governing Council officials made a 180-degree flip-flop yesterday and agreed to hold an election for the council's full-time arts and science undergraduate constituency.

The decision was made amid the possibility of an injunction blocking all Governing Council elections this spring.

Meeting in closed session, members of the "elections overseers committee" voted to accept the nomination of Victoria College French student Peter Jarrett as a candidate for the governing council ballot scheduled to be mailed to arts and science students on Friday.

During reading week the same officials had rejected Jarrett's nomination, because the ATL numbers of two of his nominators were listed incorrectly.

The officials declared that New College students Howie Stein and Shirley French, the only two remaining candidates, had been acclaimed.

They also disallowed the nomination of New College SAC rep Laurie Colman because two of his nominators listed incorrect ATL numbers and one was a part-time student. The overseers upheld Colman's disqualification yesterday.

Council election procedures require 50 nominators from the student candidate's constituency.

Supported by Students' Administrative Council president Bob Anderson, Jarrett and Colman appealed yesterday to the "overseers committee" chaired by Internal Affairs Committee chairwoman Marlene Paikin.

Paikin's committee was chiefly responsible for bringing down the code of behaviour, and yesterday she brought along university solicitor Donald Guthrie to advise the overseers. Guthrie helped draft the discipline procedures document necessitated by the code.

Jarrett brought along the two students who had written incorrect ATL numbers, and both stated they had signed Jarrett's nomination and had made simple errors.

Colman brought along the part-time student who had signed his form, unaware he had to be a full-timer, he said. The student told the overseers he had been full-time last year and at the beginning of September but had been forced to drop into Extensions.

But he continued to live in New College residence, a building open only to full-time undergraduates at registration. Thus Colman thought he was an eligible nominator.

Anderson dropped a bombshell when he told the overseers SAC had received a solid legal opinion calling the whole election procedure improper.

SAC could apply for an injunction prohibiting any Governing Council elections, he said.

"The University of Toronto Act requires the Governing Council to pass by-laws establishing election procedures," Anderson said.

"But the council has only done this by simple resolution and in terms of the Act this is inadequate. There are ample grounds for an injunction to prevent an election because the authority calling the election is not valid."

A by-law requires a majority of all Governing Council members for approval, while a resolution needs a majority only of members present.)

Anderson also pointed out that even if the election procedures are valid, the Governing Council's "Election Guidelines" document makes no mention of ATL numbers, only signatures.

An obviously unprepared Paikin said: "The Governing Council motion in force for this election stipulates that the procedures followed for the 1973 elections continue. This includes the nomination forms which require correct ATL numbers, as well as the Election Guidelines."

SAC's legal opinion, delivered by the reputable downtown firm of Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt, said the nomination forms have no status in law.

But Guthrie, who comes from the equally prestigious firm of Cassels, Brock, said the overseers could decide whether "bringing forward the procedures of the previous year includes the nomination forms as well as the Election Guidelines."

After hearing the student appeal, the overseers moved into closed session.

After 20 minutes Guthrie emerged from the meeting giving clear indication the officials were concerned with the threat of injunction.

"We've just been talking about the question of resolutions versus bylaws and now I'm leaving so I don't appear to be giving any new evidence in your absence" he told the students.

Twenty-five minutes later, the overseers gave their judgement. In a carefully worded statement, Paikin claimed the overseers wanted to "deeply salute the desire of the candidates to become involved in the Governing Council elections."

"We sincerely respect their intentions and regret difficult decisions have to be made."

Paikin declared the Governing Council had the power to establish elections procedure by resolution "and included nomination forms and the note carried forward from the 1973 procedures putting the onus on the candidate to file a valid nomination form."

Despite the claim, she announced the overseers now accepted Jarrett's nomination and overturned the acclamation decision.

But the overseers rejected Colman's position that he had filed nominations in time for officials to verify his nominators and inform him of irregularities before nominations closed. The onus was not on the officials, they ruled.

While at least momentarily heading off criticism over acclamations, the overseers' decision leaves in abeyance the injunction threat.

Colman is still considering his position and the SAC executive meets tonight to discuss the issue.

In other student constituencies SAC vice-president Stephen Moses (Meds II) is running against Terry Ruddy (Meds I) for professional student rep. David Shindman (APSC III) was acclaimed to the other professional seat. (The two professional reps must be from different faculties.)

For the two part-time student seats current rep Arlene Dick and part-time student council president Bill Whelton are being challenged by Scarborough student council vice-president Gary Heighington.

Daisy Perry (German) and Kitty Hoffman (English) are running for the graduate student seat in humanities and social sciences.

No nominations were received for the sciences graduate seat. Ballots must be returned before March 13.

Broadcast injunction becomes complicated

It started out as such a simple dramatic court case.

Two Toronto lead companies got an injunction prohibiting the CBC from broadcasting certain allegedly defamatory statements.

A court date was set and it had all the makings of a biggie: the forces of free speech line up against the forces of censorship.

Nothing ever gets that simple these days, and now the entire issue is, in fact, three separate court cases, plus a team of American experts hired by Toronto's board of health, a provincial environment minister bounced from his job although not officially for lead reasons, and irate residents claiming they are being poisoned by a neighborhood lead plant.

The court cases are a tangled web all their own.

Currently Canada Metals Co. Ltd. and Toronto Refiners and Smelters Co. Ltd., are seeking permission to appeal a February 15 ruling which quashed an injunction the two companies got January 29 prohibiting broadcast of selected portions of the CBC radio show As It Happens, entitled Dying of Lead.

They have obtained another injunction prohibiting the CBC and the Globe and Mail from publishing what the companies call defamatory material until the courts decide whether the companies can appeal or not.

In a second court action the two companies are also seeking to jail five employees of the CBC and the Globe plus Canadian Liberation Movement chairman Gary Perly for allegedly violating the first injunction by publishing allegedly court-prohibited material.

Just to make it interesting the two companies have also launched a $14,000,000 libel suit in civil court against the Globe and the CBC, the largest such suit in Canadian history.

That suit was launched shortly after Mr. Justice R.E. Holland quashed the first injunction

February 15 and said such matters are best handled in libel suits.

Auld becomes universities minister

Environment minister James Auld has been appointed by Premier William Davis to replace Jack McNie as minister of colleges and universities.

Auld is a veteran politician whose only claim to fame is holding a total of five cabinet portfolios since 1962 when then premier John Robarts first appointed him the cabinet.

He has served in transport, public works, tourism and information and the management board. First elected in 1955, Auld represents the riding of Leeds in the legislature and has won by increased majorities each time.

As a career cabinet member serving for the last decade he has continually been relegated to minor portfolios and his handling of the Canada Metals fiasco probably caused his short a stay as minister of the environment.

The ministry got an order to shut down the east end polluter but it was quashed in court when the company appealed.

As with Jack McNie, the university ministry has turned into a minor portfolio for a politicians on their way down. George Kerr preceded McNie. Kerr is now provincial solicitor general.

McNie, claimed Davis, asked to be relieved of his job for health reasons and has remained as minister without portfolio.

Auld's appointment has come as a disappointment to those who hoped for amore dynamic minister for the top job in what has become a department of universities run by the civil service, most notably deputy minister James Parr.

VUSAC rejects non-academic discipline code

Victoria University Students' Administrative Council (VUSAC) has changed its position on the discipline code and now rejects the non-academic section of the code, moving to a position identical to that of the main campus SAC.

VUSAC's new position came in a February 19 letter to internal affairs chairwoman Marne Paikin following a January 21 letter in which VUSAC said it could accept Simcoe Hall's entire discipline package, but with a number of modifications here and there.

VUSAC's newly-found objections to the non-academic section of the code are based on the duplication between the non-academic section of the discipline code and certain provisions in the criminal code.

VUSAC says it thought initially there would be no problems between the two codes being in effect simultaneously, but a meeting with the joint task force on discipline convinced them a student could easily be tried both in university and criminal courts for the same offence.

This VUSAC termed "double jeopardy," although many legal specialists say double jurisdiction is a better description.

The VUSAC letter says:

"The rationale for any code of behavior at the university must be that it somehow maintains good order unoppressively in those situations to which its structure and function may give rise and which are not dealt with by the law of the land."

Without once discussing the merits or lack of merits in the current proposed academic section of the code, the VUSAC letter says: "The academic section of the code fulfills these conditions."

"The non-academic section of the code does not fulfill these conditions, since it either creates an oppressive situation by the threat of double jeopardy or it provides a sanctuary to members from the law of the land."

Ryerson gets reading week after students organize

By MIKE EDWARDS

Ryerson students last night won the right to an extended reading week after organizing for support at Academic Council meeting.

They won more than they asked for.

The motion, which changed the study break from Friday through Monday to the full week of March 4 through March 8, carried by a vote of 58 to 26.

Academic vice president Jim Pacham said he would communicate to all departments that the study break would extend from Friday March 1 to Friday March 8 for this year.

He said the study week would be a permanent feature of the academic calendar.

The previous meeting of the council, held earlier this month, defeated the motion 28 to 24. Similar motions have been defeated several times during the two-year history of this parity body.

The academic council of Ryerson has 111 members and has equal faculty-student-administration representation.

The chairman of the meeting, Ryerson president Donald Mordell, said he assumed the Board of Governors would ratify the motion.

Pissed off? School getting you down? If you're in a rut of any sort, a great way to get out of it would be to drop out.

Figures released by the office of statistics and records indicate that they just don't make dropouts like they used to.

Mid-year figures won't be available until the end of the academic year, so the most recent figures are those released on December 1.

These indicate that of the arts and science students on the St. George Campus, only 2.4 per cent had dropped out by Dec. 1, compared to 2.08 per cent last year and 2.3 per cent the year before.

The only comforting news was in the drop out rate in the Bachelor of Education program. Of the students enrolled in it 7.4 per cent decided before Christmas that "education" wasn't really worthwhile.

This constitutes a bumper year of dropouts compared to last year's rate of just under 7 per cent, and a big leap from 4.6 per cent the year before that.

In a somewhat predictable reply, a spokesman for the statistics and records office commented there were "no striking developments."

Apologizing for not being able to provide something more sensational, he added: "It doesn't really change all that much from year to year."

"The last three years have been very much the same." It seems things have been rather dull since the 1970-71 low of 1.6 per cent.

Why not drop out today? Like right now. You could have a lasting impact on statistics.

Music Thursday Night; if music be the food...

O did he ever live, that lonely man,
Who loved - and music slew not? 'Tis the pest
Of love, that fairest joys give most unrest;
That things of delicate and tenderest worth
Are swallowed all, and made a seared dearth,
By one consuming flame: it doth immerse
And suffocate true blessings in a curse.
Half-happy, by comparison of bliss,
Is miserable. 'Twas even so with this
Dew-dropping melody, in the Carian's ear;
First heaven, then hell, and then forgotten clear,
Vanished in elemental passion.

Racist theories becoming fashionable in universities

Racism and the allegedly racist theories taught by Dr. Ian Hector have become issues at this university during the past academic year.

In the following articles, reprinted from the University of Waterloo student newspaper, the chevron, we attempt to open up the discussion of racism to a wider audience than it has so far involved.

The U of T Governing Council has neglected the issue; perhaps members of the university community would like to comment on it through letters or an op-ed piece. For this reason we are presenting the following series of articles, two today and one in Friday's paper. Comments, criticism, etc., are welcomed.

By DENNIS HIGGS and BILL WADGE

Did you know that:

(1) the rich are rich because they are inherently clever and cultured people;

(2) the poor are poor because they are inferior; they live like animals, breed like rabbits, and are inherently stupid; in particular:

(3) the Black race is genetically inferior to the White race.

Naturally, you are skeptical; probably the ravings of some 19th century reactionary, or even excerpts from Mein Kampf. But you are wrong—these are 'scientifically proven facts', 'discoveries' of the new blame-the-victim school of social science.

The names are probably familiar to you—Banfield, who says the poor like slums; Herstein, who says unemployment is hereditary; and Jensen, who has 'proven' that Blacks are inferior. They have different opinions but they all agree that if you're poor, or discriminated against, it's because there's something wrong with you—most likely your genes. Their remedies literally include concentration camps (Banfield) and sterilization (Shockley).

Tenured professors and their theories

These men are not isolated crazies. They are tenured professors, departmental chairmen, presidential advisors. They are the recipients of lavish government and foundation grants. Their ideas have been given extensive and usually favourable coverage in the press. Their theories are taught in classrooms and assigned as reading in hundreds of universities in North America—including Toronto.

This article and another to follow, are intended to counteract the influence of the victim-blamers, and to show them to be as unscientific as they are vicious. Their theories are propaganda, and very dangerous propaganda at that.

It would seem that refuting Jensen et al should be the job of social science courses; this is true in some courses, but in others the student is assigned Jensen, period.

In this first article we will briefly summarize the ideas of the leading scientific racists. This first article is not intended to be a rebuttal.

In the early sixties, during the nonviolent phase of the civil rights movement, liberal pro-equality ideas dominated the rhetoric of government and academia. Equality was exalted, racism condemned.

The ghetto riots-rebellions which began in Watts changed all this. Surely, so the argument went, there must be something wrong with someone who would riot just because of slumlordism, job discrimination and killer cops.

As presidential advisor Daniel P. Moynihan said, "...compassion for the Christlike suffering of the nonviolent Negro demonstrators in the South was a different thing from loving and understanding the frequently debased and disorderly slumdweller of the North" (1).

The first attempts to formulate this opinion scientifically were rather crude. Doctors Sweet, Mark and Ervin suggested "...factors including brain dysfunction in the rioters who engaged in arson, sniping and physical assault" (2). Moynihan came up with the theory that Black problems were due to a "declining matriarchal family" and suggested that Black men could regain their manhood by joining the US Army (3).

Culturally predisposed poverty

From these beginnings developed the widespread theory of the "culture of poverty" which holds that poverty is mainly a product of the warped personalities and all-round inferiority of the poor. This is the theme of Edward Banfield's book The Unheavenly City.

Banfield characterizes as "pathological" the culture of the "lower class" who, he says, are mainly Black. The book has to be read to be believed: "The lower class individual lives in the slums and sees little or no reason to complain. He does not care how dirty and dilapidated his housing is, nor does he mind the inadequacy of public facilities as schools, parks and libraries" (p. 62).

Banfield repeats almost every disgusting racist stereotype ever invented: they enjoy being able to "beat one's children and lie drunk in the gutter" (p. 53); they cannot control their sexual impulses (p. 53); they take "no interest in work" (p. 53).

His recommendations include "2a repealing the minimum wage law. 2b ceasing to overpay for low-skilled public employment...4...encourage (or require) (the lower class poor) to reside in an institution or semi-institution, for example a closely supervised public housing project...10...abridge to an appropriate degree the freedom of those who in the opinion of a court are extremely likely to commit a violent crime" (p. 245-246).

The high-rise concentration camps in recommendation 4 are becoming common in South Africa as convenient warehouses for cheap Black labour. Banfield's book is used, usually uncritically, in over 200 universities in North America, from Harvard to Berkeley to Toronto. He complains that his proposals will not be implemented because public opinion would be against them.

The book, we assume, is intended to help change that. The only thing missing is the master race theory. Enter Arthur Jensen.

In 1968 the editors of the influential Harvard Educational Review (HER) asked professor Arthur R. Jensen of Berkeley to submit a paper on racial differences. The result was the notorious "How Much Can We Boost IQ and Scholastic Achievement?" (4), at 125 pages the longest article ever published in the HER.

Jensen's basic argument is that since "intelligence is what IQ tests measure" (5), Blacks, who score lower on IQ tests, must be less intelligent. Jensen cites studies which supposedly show IQ differences among whites to be 80 per cent due to heredity, and so concludes that "it is not an unreasonable hypothesis" that the Black-White difference is genetic.

Moreover, he claims that there are actually two types of intelligences: level I, which corresponds to rote learning, and level II, conceptual thinking. Jensen claims that Blacks are good at level I but poor at level II, and that the schools should take 'advantage' of this difference.

The article received intensive and largely uncritical press coverage. "Can negroes learn the same way Whites do?" appeared in U.S. News and World Report - Saturday Review excerpted parts of his paper; and Newsweek ran an article entitled "Born Dumb?". Not to mention Time, Life, New Republic, Saturday Evening Post and so on.

Jensen did nothing to discourage this sensationalism and even granted many interviews including one on the David Susskind TV show. In these interviews he dropped his pretense of academic neutrality and campaigned hard for racial superiority.

It was in the NY Times Magazine that he announced that "there are intelligence genes which are found in populations in different proportions, somewhat like the distribution of blood types. The number of intelligence genes seems lower, overall, in the Black population than in the White" (6). In the same interview: "Some children will be happiest and most productive learning by rote alone. Others, who have conceptual abilities, should be in classes where they can make the best use of them. If this results in a racial imbalance in classes, then so be it." (7)

Jensen: Blacks less intelligent

The HER article was introduced as evidence for the defence in a desegregation suit in Virginia. The suit failed, as Jensen had 'established' the need for separate and unequal schooling. (8)

In 1972 Jensen spoke before the US Senate

Committee and reiterated his position: no discrimination, cause Blacks to learn. He concluded that improving schools in poorer districts would be a waste (9). No wonder our country is in the dumps. The winds of change are blowing through the capitol.

Shortly after the appearance of the HER article, several more 'scientific' master race bandwagons appeared. * England's H. J. Eysenck, author of Jensen's theories called them "racist propaganda". In it he explains that the difference between the Whites and the Blacks.

* Stanford's William Shockley, Nobel prize winning transistor. Shockley is responsible for the definition of racism as you'll find in the dictionary. He has reliable predictions...can be made by the pragmatic man-in-the-street.

Most frightening of all is the Nazi-style eugenics, selective breeding, betterment. Shockley claims that Blacks are out-breeding the Whites. He advocates a sterilization plan whereby each Black couple receives $1,000 for each child born.

And if that doesn't scare you, here's another HER article: "Is there a day when welfare policies, unaided by the government, could lead to the genetic extermination of our population?" what constitutes "eugenic for the future?"

Banfield, Jensen et al do not mention the fact that they are widely used at Toronto as at even Canadian ones. But the book, Psychology, A Search for Understanding, edited by Dyal, Corning and Waterlow.

Jensen's genetic theories

We described above how Jensen's theories are being used by biologists and psychologists as they try to 'prove' their "scientific" basis on which they proceed to make their racist recommendations as to what should be done.

A.R. Jensen's article How Much Can We Boost IQ and Scholastic Achievement? is an extensive attempt to tie supposed differences in intelligence to genetic factors. Its main points may be summarized as follows:

(1) IQ measures intelligence.

(2) IQ is eighty per cent hereditary.

(3) "genetic factors are strongly correlated with the average Negro-white intelligence difference" (2).

This article will discuss point one of Jensen's argument; point one is the most important.

That Blacks score lower on IQ tests is not disputed. Jensen's argument is that he has put the Black-White difference in IQ in genetic terms, relying on data collected by Arthur R. Jensen, in The Testing of Negroes, whose avowed purpose is to prove that the IQ of Blacks is lower than that of Whites. While the fifteen-page article is technically correct, it is a serious distortion of the facts simply to cite this number.

For one thing, the data were collected in the southern US, between 1950 and 1960, a more revealing area is the wide range of Black IQ scores. Typical average IQ scores for southern Blacks, 83 for urban Blacks, 81 for northern Blacks, and 91 for high-school students. The pattern is the same for the better the schooling and the higher the middle-class culture (to which the Blacks are more exposed), the higher the score.

These figures are embarrassing to those who claim that the difference in IQ is due to selective migration, have long ago been refuted (1).

IQ the deciding factor

As regards the remaining points of Jensen's argument, Jensen says something himself which refutes his argument. These children were really bright. They would indicate. They often appear to be responsive in the test. Their first visit to my office, and case I usually had them come on different days for half-hour sessions. "play therapy" room, in which they would get better acquainted with using finger-paints...As soon as they were completely at home in the room, I would have him on a parallel form Binet." (6)

A macabre picture, but the IQ test is a very crude way of measuring intelligence. It goes up 8 to 10 points. In short, much IQ difference to explain.

As for the remaining IQ differences, there is plenty of evidence that cultural differences account for it. American Indians, and comments by Jensen and Herrnstein, not to mention a whole section on "genetic engineering".

This might not be as bad as it seems, because the book is designed to include a wide variety of opinions for discussion and criticism. However, this wide variety does not include an explicit rebuttal of the claims of racial differences in intelligence, or even any indication that a scientific criticism is possible. This is rather regrettable because Jensen, in the article which is reprinted, characterizes all his critics as over-emotional and unscientific.

What is even more regrettable is that the comments of the editors concerning race and intelligence repeat three of Jensen's more serious errors:

"...We do not know whether the observed intellectual differences between the races are due in large or small part to hereditary differences. In the case of North American and European whites we know about 80 per cent of the differences in IQ within the group are due to hereditary differences in ability. We don't know if the same proportion holds for North American blacks. Thus we can't say how much of the IQ differences between Blacks and Whites is due to heredity." (p. 230)

If we may be permitted to paraphrase these remarks, there are three basic points made:

- (1) IQ measures intelligence ("intellectual differences")
- (2) IQ is 80 per cent inheritable among whites;
- (3) If the same proportion is true for Blacks, the Black-White IQ difference is mainly due to heredity.

These three points are a concise summary of Jensen's main argument. Point (1) is false, the evidence does not support (2), and even if it were true, (3) does not logically follow! We will go into this in some detail in the next article.

Before going into Jensen's second point, the concept of heritability should be explained. To say that IQ (or any measurable trait) has a heritability of .8 in a given population means that eighty per cent of the measured differences in that population are due to hereditary differences, the remainder to environmental differences. Thus it does not make sense to talk about the heritability of IQ in general, only the heritability for particular populations.

In principle, the heritability of IQ could be estimated from the correlation between the IQ scores of any related persons, such as parents and children. The trouble with this is that there is then a close environmental, as well as genetic, similarity, so we can't say how much of our correlation is due to heredity alone. To avoid this, identical twins reared apart have been studied in detail as providing the most reliable evidence that there is for the heritability of IQ. There have been four major studies of such twins and the essential figures from these are given in the table on this page.

These correlations do suggest a high heritability for IQ and this conclusion has been widely accepted.

Recently, however, Leon J. Kamin, professor of educational psychology at Princeton, has made what is probably the most exhaustive survey of the literature on twin studies. In an invited address to the Eastern Psychological Association Convention, May 1973, he reported in detail on his findings and comes to some surprising conclusions (7).

As we saw above, it is essential to the significance of the results obtained from a study of separated twins that there be little or no correlation between the environments of the twins.

The Shields study gives considerable detail as to what kinds of cases constitute "separated twins": in two-thirds of the cases the two twins were reared in related branches of the parents' families and these twins had significantly closer IQ scores than did those reared in unrelated families. As Kamin says: "That is scarcely evidence for an overwhelmingly genetic determination of IQ scores." (8)

He continues: "The relatively modest correlation of .51 observed in twins reared in unrelated families must in no sense be taken as an estimate of what might be observed if twins were assigned to families at random. The typical case of 'unrelated families' was one in which the mother kept one twin and gave the other to 'friends of the family.'" (8).

Twins studied

Burt claimed in his study that there was no significant correlation between the statuses of the Study	Test used	Number of twin pairs	Correlation (as a percentage)

Burt (UK)	"Individual Test"	53	86
Shields (UK)	Dominoes—Mill Hill	37	77

Juel-Nielsen (Denmark)	Wechsler	12	62

homes in which the members of a separated pair were raised but, unlike Shields, Burt gave little actual detail and his claim is open to question, to say the least.

Another difficulty with twin studies is that great care must be taken to standardize the test in order to avoid correlation between test scores and age or sex: "Recall that identical twins are necessarily of the same age and sex. Thus if the measure on which members of a twin pair are compared varies with either sex or age, and if twin pairs of both sexes and of varying ages are included, the IQ correlation between twins is utterly confounded with sex and age." (9)

Kamin gives a vivid illustration of this. He lists the twins (in a given study) according to age and then groups adjacent pairs together; (A, A') with (B, B') say. Then within each of these groups he pairs each person, not with his/her actual twin, but with each of the other people in that group, so that the pairs he arrives at — (A, A'), (A, B) and (A, B') — are unrelated except in age. Yet he found for the Newman and Juel-Nielsen studies that the resulting correlations between these pairs were about as high as they were for the genuine twin pairs!

One wonders how the Burt study would have fared here, but it will never be known — Burt gave no information whatever about the ages or sexes of his twins, nor did he even leave it at all clear what tests he used.

Now the late Sir Cyril Burt is the authority most frequently cited by Jensen et al on the heritability of IQ so something should be said about these curious tests. Jensen states that the tests used by Burt were an English adaptation of the Stanford-Binet. How did Burt describe his own tests?

He reported correlations based not only upon "group test" and "final assessment", but also upon "individual test". Here is an extract from his 1966 paper: "(i) a group test of intelligence containing both non-verbal and verbal items; (ii) an individual test (the adapted Stanford-Binet); and for doubtful cases, (iii) a set of performance tests — standardized by Miss Gaw (1925). The test results...were submitted to the teachers for comment or criticism, and whenever any question arose, the child was re-examined" (10).

But in 1958, describing the same study, Burt refers to the figures reported in his tables under the heading "individual test" (the same figures listed under (ii) above) as being not Stanford-Binet, but "based on non-verbal tests of the performance type." (11)

Delving back further, Kamin found that the references supplied by Burt were of no help in sorting out this mess—though we do know that the standardization sample used by Miss Gaw in 1925 consisted of "100 pupils in London schools", and that there were "striking" differences between the sexes in test scores (12). Kamin concludes: "The numbers left behind by Professor Burt are simply not worthy of scientific attention." (13) So much for that 80 per cent!

But suppose for the sake of argument that the 80 per cent figure is also true for blacks, is Jensen right in hypothesizing that, given the fact that intelligence variation has a large genetic component, genetic factors may play a part in the black/white IQ difference. (14)

Sound logical? Well it isn't. Professor R.C. Lewontin, a noted geneticist, has debunked this argument and gives the following example: Take two handfuls of corn seed from the same sack and grow them in two uniform environments, in one of which the concentration of nitrates is cut by half. Then, within each lot, the variation in height of the grown plants is entirely genetic (no environmental variation within lots was allowed) and hence the heritability of height in each population is 100 per cent.

So we might expect heredity to play some part in the difference in average height between the two populations—but it is entirely environmental (we used the same sack!) (15)

While Jensen's genetic theories are perhaps the most attractive to a thoroughgoing racist, there are others just as vicious. These rely on such factors as lack of parental care, nutritional deficiencies, inadequate stimulation, etc.

They have as little basis in fact as Jensen's but we will not go into them; as the next article will show IQ tests do not measure intelligence. Studiousness, respect for authority, even patriotism, but not intelligence.

Quebec government cracks down on abortions

MONTREAL (CUP) — Drs. Tanguay, Yvon Macchabee and Henry Morgentaler and Joanne Cornax, a nurse, are the victims of the Quebec government's new crackdown on deficiencies of the existing abortion laws.

Tanguay, a practicing gynecologist in Montreal was arrested in his office Feb 21 on eight charges of performing abortions covering the period 1972-74.

According to Margaret Manwaring, of the Morgentaler Defense

Committee, "the arrest was a frame up. At least one female police agent was in Tanguay's office at the time of the arrest posing as a pregnant woman. While she was being examined by the doctor, 17 policemen broke in to Tanguay's office. They served him with a warrant for his arrest, confiscated much of his property and apprehended the other eight patients in the office at the time."

Tanguay was released the next day after signing an agreement to appear in court. The date for the preliminary hearing has not yet been set.

Carol Cohen also of the Morgentaler Defense Committee said, "this arrest is only one of a series of continuing harassments and victimizations by the government of supporters for abortion law repeal."

The same week, Quebec Justice Minister Jerome Choquette signed a preferred indictment against Dr. Macchabee, another Montreal doctor presently facing charges of performing abortions.

The indictment forces Macchabee's case immediately into trial without the usual preliminary hearing.

Joanne Conax, Morgentaler's nurse, was also charged by crown prosecutor Robichaud with conspiring to perform abortions. She is the first Canadian woman ever to be charged under the abortion laws.

Two weeks ago the offices and home of Morgentaler were raided by the Quebec Internal Revenue Department. "It was an invasion of privacy," said Morgentaler.

They served him with an order to pay $354,799.14.

Morgentaler has denied he owes the government back taxes and that he was not stupid enough to leave himself open for prosecution on such a charge because of his public position in favor of abortion.

Cohen said that "this stepped up offensive by the government must not go unanswered. Canadian women and their supporters have been waging an organized fight for over three years to win recognition of their right to control their reproductive lives. The Cross-Canada Committees to Defend Dr. Morgentaler are presently organizing a demonstration and tribunal to be held in Ottawa March 9. The purpose of the action is to give public evidence and testimony about the repressive nature of the Canadian law.

Academic affairs whiles away more hours

By CHRIS PROBERT

In a February 19 meeting the Governing Council's academic affairs committee waded through a number of small items which have accumulated over the past month while the committee focussed its attention elsewhere on the Report of the Forster task force.

Reports number 16 and 17 of the Subcommittee on Curriculum and Standards were presented, and involved minor additions to course offerings and changes in prerequisites in three faculties and the School of Graduate Studies.

The next item on the agenda was somewhat meager. This was the Kellogg proposal, an attempt to get funds from the Kellogg Foundation "for a centre for the facilitating of teaching and learning."

Contingent on the approval of academic affairs, the Kellogg proposal was passed at a Governing Council meeting last Thursday.

The proposed centre would concern itself with standards of teaching at the university level, unlike the present College of Education, which deals only with public and secondary school teaching.

In the words of academic affairs student rep Gord Barnes, the Kellogg proposal is evidence of "a general concern about the quality of teaching, which unfortunately does not extend to doing much about it."

Barnes was skeptical about the effect, if any, the centre would have on university teaching.

"Until the real reason for poor teaching is dealt with directly," said Barnes, "a centre will not make much difference." The "real reason," it is generally admitted, is the necessity for professors to commit much of their time to research, as part of getting ahead.

The proposed centre has not yet been assigned a physical location, and there has been no suggestion of making use of it compulsory, though there may be.

An amendment to the statute of the School of Graduate Studies was passed, allowing part-time grad students to be elected to the School of Graduate Studies Council.

The Institute of Environmental Sciences and Engineering had its name changed to the Institute of Environmental Studies, thus broadening its scope by removing the restriction to either science or engineering.

The committee then deliberated on a proposal from the Faculty of Music for a new seal.

Fashion Notes: What is the fashionable graduate wearing this spring? Academic Affairs also considered a report concerning hoods for the degrees of Bachelor of Science, Physical Therapy and Bachelor of Science, Occupational Therapy.

Here is a sample of what you can expect on Convocation day:

The Bachelor of Science in Occupational Therapy will be bedecked in an Oxford Bachelor hood, with a dark blue (as Medicine) shell. The hood is trimmed with white fur and a strip of medium gray silk, white braid on gray silk, and a second strip of kelly green. Toronto society is agog (to put it mildly).

Rankin gets garbage

By JANE WATERSTON

To reduce the amount of trivia calling for the attention of Governing Council, the power to dispose of surplus equipment belonging to U of T has been given to the business affairs committee. The move must be made in conjunction with the purchasing department and the dean of the faculty involved, said business affairs vice president Alex Rankin.

Formerly the approval of Governing Council was necessary for the sale of any asset belonging to the university.

Any sale involving an asset worth between $10,000 and $100,000 must be reported to Governing Council and council's approval is still necessary for the disposal of equipment worth more than $100,000.

For instance, the sale of 188 Yonge

Street, an asset worth $400,000 needed the approval of both Rankin and the Governing Council. On the other hand, the disposal of university president John Evan's limousine, worth less than $100,000 would need only Rankin's O.K.

Judicial inquiry into Artistic strike possible

Chances for a judicial inquiry into the Artistic Woodwork strike have increased since the exposure of the existence of a company spy, union spokesmen claim.

Last week, at a press conference, the Canadian Textile and Chemical Union (CTCU), announced it had knowledge Ronald Masut who picketed with striking workers during the Artistic strike was a company spy.

The Artistic Woodwork company has admitted Masut was hired to spy on the union one month before the actual strike date, August 21, according to the union.

The union revealed Masut was hired through Wackenhut, a Florida-based detective agency "specializing in strike-breaking." According to the union, Wackenhut is affiliated with the Anning security agency.

Masut was paid between 8 and 10 dollars an hour for his work, the union claimed.

"We suspected him right from the beginning for his provocative actions on the picket line," said one union official.

"We didn't know he was a company spy until the second day after the end of the strike," he added.

Before the union released its information Masut was convicted on charges arising out of the Artistic strike. He was fined $200, said a union official.

However, after the news broke, five charges against Masut were dropped by the Crown which maintained the principal arresting constable, Roland Kotkovicz, was no longer with the force.

Apparently, Kotkovicz was urged to resign due to an internal police inquiry not related to Artistic, union spokesmen said.

The Crown suggested the evidence of the former constable was not considered "credible," said the union.

However, the union noted that Kotkovicz testified at two trials which occurred just before his resignation.

The accused in these trials were found innocent but the union questions why the former constable's evidence is no longer valid.

Furthermore, the union said, "the police were all in on letting this guy (Masut) off."

The fact the company employed a spy before the actual strike reveals the company was "not willing to bargain in good faith," said union spokesmen.

The Canadian Textile and Chemical Union was on strike at two Artistic Woodwork plants in North York over basic union rights. The strike lasted 14 weeks and resulted in 108 arrests.

To date, there have been 42 convictions, six conditional discharges, and 36 acquittals.

The union is urging people to attend Artistic trials March 4, 7, and 12 when workers and union officials are scheduled for trial.

Ontario drops trade missions to South Africa

Ontario taxpayers' will not be paying for businessmen to wing their way to South Africa next year according to industry and tourism minister Claude Bennett.

The decision came as a response to pressure from the revelation last October that the Ontario government was yielding to public opinion "rather than becoming involved in a public controversy."

The mission, scheduled to go to Johannesburg, took place last November.

An argument flared in the legislature where NDP leader Stephen Lewis tore into the government for helping in continuing oppression in Southern Africa.

Bennett replied the Ontario government always tries to separate politics from business. He added: "we don't deal with governments, we deal in industry."

The new trade mission will include Brazil, Peru, Columbia and Venezuela, Bennett called the South African mission "successful."

The government is spending more than $300,000 on trade missions to help Ontario industry.

They have taken more than 2,000 businessmen on 241 trade missions during the past 10 years. Bennett acknowledged the scheme is to make the companies more profitable.

He said greater emphasis will be given to increase trade in Asia, Latin America and Africa. The minister will be specially concerned in his two week trip which started yesterday with increasing Canadian trade ties with the military regime in Brazil.

Brazil, governed by a military dictatorship is a home for US investment and is one of America's greatest allies in South Africa. The regime has carried out a campaign of torture and repression according to Amnesty International.

Testing ground closing

America's testing ground for chemical-biological warfare (CBW), located in Suffield, Alberta, is to be phased out over the next three years, according to Canada's department of national defense (DND).

The fate of US CBW research in Canada, however, is unclear as the DND announced:

"As the defence research activities at Suffield have been substantially reduced over the years, they can now be more economically accommodated at other research establishments

"Also, field trials (DND jargon for CBW testing) of the type carried on at Suffield are no longer required."

Whether the DND means

American CBW is no longer needed in Suffield or just no longer needed for the Americans is not stated in the official release.

However, the DND is opening a new establishment in Winnipeg and some of the 184 scientists and technical employees at Suffield will be moved to Winnipeg and others to other Canada bases.

The Canadian Armed Forces training base at Suffield, is to continue to operate.

During the peak years of direct American military involvement in Indochina, the 1,000 square mile site at Suffield was a key area for the US to test and develop gas and germ warfare used in South Vietnam and other Indochinese countries.

Portuguese 'live in harmony' with subjects

Portuguese colonialism not so bad, says prof

Portugal is no worse a landlord than any other imperial power, a University of Victoria political scientist claimed Thursday.

Dr. Edgar Efrat, recently returned from Africa, was speaking in a debate on "The Canadian involvement in Portuguese Africa", sponsored by the Canadian Institute of International Affairs.

Efrat claimed Portuguese had long lived "in harmony" with their colonial subjects, unlike other European powers such as Spain and Britain.

"Portugal's policy is not a racial policy," he said. Any racism that exists is like that in "any other capitalist country."

The various liberation movements could not hope to unify a Portuguese dominated country, since "the primary loyalty is a local loyalty."

"The African villager is concerned with local life, local politics, his family," Efrat said. The average citizen of Mozambique "doesn't even know where the capital city is."

Efrat stated Portuguese language, and Portuguese control, was the only factor unifying the area.

Efrat also said he visited all the territories in Mozambique that guerrillas claim to have liberated.

"In no instance was there a locality to which I could not get."

Efrat claimed that continued Portuguese control over sections of Africa was important to Canadian interests. NATO fleets need secure bases, and oil and coffee produced in the area would be hard to obtain from a black government.

He stated 70 per cent of the coffee plantations in Angola are already owned by blacks, a fact disputed by those boycotting Angolan coffee.

Efrat's views were challenged by United Church minister Murray MacInnes, who spent 10 years in Angola as a missionary.

MacInnes spoke of the "unfinished revolution" in Portuguese Africa, in which "fundamental human rights are denied."

Portugal, said MacInnes, has a policy to "keep the power and the privilege in the hands of the white minorities" by deliberately limiting the franchise accorded to black Africans.

He accused the Portuguese of systematic exploitation of black Africans, noting 700,000 Africans had been forced to move from their villages to "strategic hamlets" located by roadsides, where they could be watched by authorities.

MacInnes also said the liberation movement was "paying off" among Africans, with a "consciousness that they are rightfully people as Africans."

Efrat's rejoinder was "why pick on Portugal?"

U of T political science professor Robert Matthews, chairing the debate, concluded if one views Portugal's overseas possessions as "provinces," then Canada had no right to criticize Portugal's policy.

If, however, one saw Portugal's possessions as colonies, then one had every right to be concerned, said Matthews.

The federal government is presently considering giving humanitarian aid to liberation movements in Portuguese Africa, pending a survey of public opinion.

Tenants fight high rise deterioration

By ELEANOR SIMPSON

Last week an injunction aimed at preventing tenants of the 103 and 105 West Lodge Ave. high-rises paying rental payments into a trust fund to be used for repairs to these two buildings was adjourned indefinitely.

West Lodge Towers, a 720-suite apartment complex situated in the Parkdale area of Toronto has had a long and consistent history of mismanagement and resulting deterioration of the relatively new buildings.

The two adjoining buildings have been cited with 344 violations of the city housing standards by-law.

The absence of a functioning intercom system and lack of any type of security has left the buildings open to rampant vandalism and has negated any stop gap repairs undertaken.

Fires are an almost daily occurrence putting tenants' lives in jeopardy.

Last week between Sunday morning and Thursday three or four fires took place.

Fire alarm bells have been reconnected within the buildings but are turned off when they start to ring—vandals or pranksters had formerly been ringing the fire alarms at will resulting in their being disconnected—and it was only when tenants smelled smoke that the fire department was called.

Inoperative elevators, cockroaches and vermin, lack of heat and hot water, litter and debris represent other hazards tenants have to face.

Rents in the apartments are not exactly modest; minimum rent for a two-bedroom is $190 while the average rent is about $200 a month. Ownership of West Lodge Towers is unclear.

Philip Wynn, who has been cited as a "contemptible landlord" by Judge P.J. Bosley in court, currently operates the buildings as third mortgagee in possession.

The question of ownership has always been precarious, frustrating tenants' efforts to affix responsibility for management and maintenance of the buildings.

Wynn informed the Toronto commissioner of development on January 11, 1974 that he was in possession of the building and intended to start on the outstanding repairs within a week.

A city work order from October 5 had been substantially fulfilled except for three exterior items, painting of balconies, replacement of fences and concrete work to the garage.

The city property department had intended to start work on some repairs but impressed with Wynn's approach, action by city forces was delayed.

During the uncertain period preceding the change in ownership to Wynn, further deterioration and vandalism was noted. City work orders issued to all tenants and owners on January 25 cited some 344 items of disrepair.

Because neither Wynn or the city have really made much of a move to clean up these problems, concerned tenants have been active in organizing their neighbors to take direct action.

Gays protest stalling by Human Rights Commission

The Ontario Human Rights Commission has been stalling since August on the issue of discrimination against gay people, according to the Gay Alliance Toward Equality (GATE).

That stalling led 35 people to picket the commission offices February 18 with little success in getting commission representatives to act on a brief submitted by GATE to the commission last August.

Representatives from GATE and other homosexual organizations met with commission director Robert McPhee after the demonstration and reported no results from the conversation.

GATE quoted McPhee as saying: "The commission did discuss the matter again and reached the point of giving me absolutely nothing to report back."

"It's as simple as that. They discussed but they reached no conclusion and took no position."

The GATE brief submitted in August urged the commission to recommend to Queen's Park the Human Rights Code be changed to include "sexual orientation" as an area in which discrimination would be prohibited.

The brief also urged the commission to establish a study group to research and investigate discrimination cases against homosexuals.

GATE spokesmen said the deputation to McPhee urged him to follow the lead set last summer by the Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission which urged the Saskatchewan government to include "sexual orientation" in that province's laws forbidding discrimination.

But McPhee is quoted by GATE as dodging the issue.

"What McPhee is saying," GATE spokesman Ron Dayman said "is that the commission refuses to deal with problems of oppressed minorities.

"What they want is a clear indication that the public is behind any proposed revision of the code."

"At this point, we might ask what the function of the OHRC is if it is not, in fact, to work for the alleviation of discrimination by changing rather than reacting to public opinion."

Last October, GATE was a prime mover behind the vote in Toronto's city council which moved to prohibit discrimination against gay people in hiring for city employees.

Meanwhile GATE intends to keep the issue of the lack of protection against discrimination for homosexuals before the public by continuing its campaign for a protective clause in provincial human rights legislation.

Chilean academic repression condemned by 480 faculty

More than 480 U of T faculty have signed three letters protesting the imprisonment of three academics by the Chilean junta which overthrew the government of the late president Salvador Allende in September.

One of the letters, addressed to External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp asks Sharp to allow the academics to come to Canada because the "personal safety of these persons is threatened."

The campaign has been coordinated from the office of Innis principal Peter Russell. Sent off two weeks ago, there has been no reply yet to the letters.

The other two letters were sent to the head of Chile's junta, General Augusto Pinochet, and the president of the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

The three academics are:

- Allende's minister of education, Edgardo Enriquez, a medical professor and president of the University of Concepcion, now imprisoned on Dawson Island;

- Enrique Kirberg, electrical engineering professor and president of State Technical University, architecture professor at the University of Chile and now held at Dawson Island;

- Galo Gomez, mathematics professor and past vice-president of the University of Concepcion, president of the National Commission of Scientific and Technological Research and is now arrested and detained awaiting trial.

The letter to junta leader Pinochet asks for the release of the three, safe conduct for them out of Chile and "the guaranteed right for Chilean academics and students to work and study in their universities."

The letter to the UN asks the Human Rights Commission to investigate arrests and disappearances of Chilean academics and in particular seeks to have the UN use its influence to release the three named Chilean academics.

The letter says: "The presidents of all Chilean universities have been dismissed from their positions and replaced by officials of the armed forces."

"Several hundred academics have been arrested, or fired from their posts."

SCSC to consider Canadian faculty question

Scarborough College Student Council (SCSC) president Ross Flowers has brought forward a policy statement for consideration on the "Canadianization" of faculty in Ontario's universities.

Taking the recommendations of the Select Committee of the Ontario Legislature on Economic and Cultural Nationalism as a basis for discussion, Flowers wants the SCSC "to question the wisdom of implementing a 'quota' system at this time." However, he does "support in principle the recommendation of the select committee dealing with future trends in Ontario universities and colleges."

The Committee on Economic and Cultural Nationalism recommends an 80 per cent quota for Canadian faculty in Ontario universities, but Flowers said "the primary qualification in the appointment of teaching staff must be academic ability and not citizenship. Failure to comply with this basic philosophy would," he feels, "be detrimental and certainly prejudicial to the achievement of a high standard of education."

Although he agrees "in principle" with the report and in some cases even the specific recommendations, Flowers would like the SCSC to "reject at this time the placing of citizenship ahead of ability as a potentially counter-productive measure which is liable to have severe repercussions on the future of Ontario society."

Flowers says the best way to achieve "Canadianization" is to implement the select committee's own recommendations on graduate programs and graduate schools.

"Strong graduate programs will ultimately produce professional candidates of superior ability, thus enabling universities to select Canadian teaching staff without having to sacrifice merit in order to obtain indigenous staffing appointments."

Flowers urges the provincial government to provide "both the financial and other resources to one or more universities to ensure the best quality of education for students in Ontario graduate schools."

"In such a situation we would expect the majority of professional appointments will be Canadian as preference should be given to Canadians who have equal ability with non-Canadian applicants, in order to ensure the socio-economic security of our native talent."

Flowers feels the committee's recommendations are correct in stressing the need for more Canadians in arts and science-related courses, while allowing a more liberal interpretation in the science-related faculties.

"However, he says, "it becomes desirable to place a preference on Canadian talent to both encourage a progressive and enlightened society, as well as to safeguard against the creation or perpetuation of a highly educated unemployed community within the province."

Flowers also says there is no need or justification to apply a similar Canadianization philosophy when appointing administrators to post-secondary institutions. He sees the role of an administrator as quite different from that of an academic. "Whereas the former is primarily a manager, the latter is concerned with the continuing process of providing a medium through which future generations of citizens can acquire useful and necessary knowledge."

However, Flowers does support the select committee's recommendation that all administrative staff be Canadian within a five-year period.

Mental illness called a myth: 'isolates those who don't fit in'

REGINA (CUP) — The myth of mental illness is an historically new phenomenon. The concept of mental illness arose with the advent of capitalism and is used to isolate people who do not "fit in" to the work force or society in general.

So said Michael Galan and Jackie Christeve, members of the Rough Times Collective, who told students at the University of Saskatchewan in Regina about the problems of present methods of therapy and the myth of mental illness.

The Rough Times Collective is a group of people who believe therapy is change not adjustment. They stress the need for new ways of dealing with problems, ways to heal ourselves and each other.

Galan compared the rise of the concept of mental illness with the persecution of the witches, who were midwives and healers, and threatened persecution of the witches, who were midwives and healers, and threatened the power of the church and the emergence of the male medical profession.

People in power labelled these women as witches to rationalize their elimination. "Mentally ill" people are labelled and locked away from sight because those people who are not "stable" cannot be of productive value to capitalist society, the speakers claimed.

They said the situation in most psychiatric hospitals does not promote or even allow the "cure" of patients. The patients are treated as insane and thus, as inmates in prison learn to be criminals, inmates in asylums learn to be mad.

Present methods of therapy treat problems as though they are the patient's own making. There is no probing of social situations.

Christeve believes that only women therapists who are feminists can help women clients. A male therapist, no matter how well-intentioned, will pass on masculine prejudices, she said.

Christeve stressed the necessity of therapist and client sharing experiences and emotions. Therapy must be a situation in which the client becomes strong not dependent.

She feels that graduates of psychology are taught to remove themselves from their clients to be unemotional. Such an attitude reinforces power relationships, she said.

Both speakers said the mental health profession, and society itself must be challenged and changed.

Western drops women's v'ball team

By PAT DARTFORD

The University of Toronto women's volleyball team had to settle for second best in the OWIAA championships held this past weekend in Ottawa. As in previous finals, it was the University of Western that ended Toronto's championship hopes.

Friday's competition began with the Blues facing McMaster. The Mac team was at its peak after upsetting a strong Waterloo squad, but the big Blue machine started in high gear with 15-2, 15-9 victories.

Frances Walmsley provided consistent digging for Marion Thomson's accurate sets, while Judie Trevelyan and Shaughn Renehan finished off the Blues' attack with power hitting down the line or cross-court.

In the second match, the Blues were out to revenge their Challenge Cup loss at the hands of Waterloo, but the Athenas came in fighting after their earlier loss to Mac and squeaked out a 15-13 win over the Blue team in game one.

The Blues rallied to demolish Waterloo 15-3 in game two. Mary Drakich served eight consecutive points in Toronto's triumph.

In the deciding third game, U of T started quickly. Jane Nixon blocked the black and gold's spiking efforts and led the Blues' attack, hitting through or over the Waterloo defenders at the net. Despite Waterloo's determined play to make another dramatic comeback, the Blues fought to a 15-10 victory.

Laurentian was the last opponent for Toronto's Friday play. U of T quickly took game one with a convincing 15-1 win. Marion Thomson's ten successful serves over the net accounted for the major part of Toronto's score.

It was the end of an exhausting day when the Voyageurs from Sudbury began to pick holes in the Blues' defense. Toronto needed every ounce of stored energy to extinguish the Laurentian fire with a 16-14 win in the second game.

Early Saturday morning, the Blues took to the court against their traditional rivals, Western, in the first of their two meetings. The purple gang was too much to handle as they overpowered and outlasted the Blues' rally efforts. The final scores were 15-10, and 15-8.

The host university, Ottawa, proved to be a tough opponent for U of T's final match. The Blues were fortunate to take the first game 16-14, but the Ottawa team continued to penetrate the struggling Blues defense and came away with a 15-13 win in game two.

Toronto came to life again in game three and dominated play with a 15-1 win. Heli Kaur's overall consistent serving and playing, helped Toronto dispose of the troublesome Ottawa team.

Through regular scheduled play, Irene Bereckij, Peggy Duff, and Valerie Long came through with determined efforts when called into action at key times when the Blues appeared to hit a periodic slump. While the other teams departed for the showers, the big Blue team awaited their Western opponents, the defending OWIAA champs.

The University of Western outplayed and outthusted a tired but fighting U of T team to capture the championship again with 15-3, 15-9 wins.

Irene Hammerich came through with a fine display of blocking and spiking in a losing cause.

Despite the final outcome, the Blue team had a good season and with the bulk of members returning, should be strong again next year.

Things are looking up!

Waterpolo in trouble

By MIKE MILNE

The men's interfaculty waterpolo season is finishing off the way it started — dismally. This hasn't been the worst season in recent years but it was close, the main problem being a severe lack of competition.

The first division finished play before reading week with two games. PHE bombed Trin 16-4. Phillips (5), Brankovsky, Connally and Ball (one each), scored for PHE.

Mossop scored two for Trin and Grant got one.

In the other first division game, Vic I downed Eng I 5-4 in a well-played game. Warner scored two for Vic while Pusching, Hytonen and McLeod netted one each. Elder scored three for Eng, with Gesing getting the other.

The remaining second division games will be played this week with the playoffs to start next week.

Ice Blues win quarter-finals over Queen's

By PAUL CARSON

This team effort must be catching on. First the swimmers sacrifice individual glory to win the OUAA championship, then the hockey Blues, often criticized for being a collection of prima donnas, put together an outstanding team effort for 60 minutes to defeat Queen's Golden Gaels 3-0 last night.

The victory before about 1500 fans and two engineering bands at the Arena gave Blues the sudden-death quarter-final playoff game and advanced Varsity to the OUAA semi-finals this weekend.

Blues play Western Mustangs, 4-2 victors over Guelph, 6:30 Friday night at the Arena. Friday's second game matches York and likely Waterloo.

Freshman goaltender Robert Oss stopped 22 Queen's shots to record the shutout in his first playoff game. Oss wasn't tested too severely as Blues played a strong defensive game in the face of persistent Queen's forechecking. When Blues forwards decided to do some checking of their own in the final period, Gaels simply couldn't get untracked.

Captain Warren Anderson was by far the dominant player in the game, clearing loose pucks from his own end and engineering several dangerous rushes.

Blues missed four clear chances in the first period before veteran centre Ivan McFarlane opened the scoring at 17:21, beating Queen's netminder Dave Dungey with a quick wrist shot from 25 feet out.

Both teams concentrated on checking during the scoreless middle period, and then Blues wrapped it up on two goals within 44 seconds early in the final stanza.

Kent Ruhnke made the most of an unexpected opportunity at 3:29 when a defensive lapse allowed him to pick up a loose puck and walk in unopposed to score.

Former captain Gord Davies concluded the scoring at 4:13 when he whipped a quick screen shot between Dungey's legs.

Blues had a 42-22 edge in shots and Queen's took 7 of twelve minor penalties in the slow but nonetheless exciting game.

Women's intermediate v'ball team wins title

The women's intermediate volleyball team captured the OWIAA championships at the tournament held the weekend of February 15 and 16 at Ryerson.

The team sewed up the first place spot by winning all five of their matches of this final tournament. The first game was against a spirited Ryerson team on Friday morning, and the Blues emerged victors in four games.

The highlight of the tournament was the U of T MacMaster match, which was played Friday evening. The Toronto team showed their superiority playing by taking the match in four games.

Bright and early Saturday morning U of T won their third match, defeating Trent in four games; and then went on to play a fine game against a strong Queens team, defeating them in three games straight. To end the weekend on a good note, Toronto defeated a weak Brock team.

The strong and accurate spiking of Helen Traczewski, the consistent setting of Melinda Shilton and serving of Ruth Cruickshank and Sue Thompson, along with the skilled play of the rest of the team resulted in U of T's winning the intermediate volleyball championships.

Swimmers win OUAA championships — again

By PAUL CARSON

The men's swimming team discovered a new way to win the OUAA championship last weekend in Waterloo—selfless team effort in place of individual heroics.

The result was Varsity's fourteenth consecutive title and in the process 17 Toronto swimmers qualified for this weekend's national CIAU championships in Sudbury.

The host Waterloo team shaved down for the league meet and managed to make the final score far closer than Blues have experienced in several seasons. Official results were: Toronto 509½ points, Waterloo 451, Western 284, Queens 153, McMaster 144, Guelph 106, Ottawa 105, Laurentian 30, Windsor 14, RMC five.

In past years Blues usually won with ease as their big names churned to easy victories and dragged the lesser lights along almost in their wake.

The nadir of this arrangement probably came in 1971 when Mike Guinness had to deliberately lose the 1650 freestyle so that a freshman might qualify for the CIAU finals.

Guinness won the 1650 last weekend but more importantly, the lesser-known Varsity swimmers had a tremendous meet and qualified for the CIAU on their own merits. Personal best times were shattered by as much as ten seconds as the freshmen and sophomores produced their finest efforts of the year.

The big names such as Jim Adams, John Sebben, Dave Wilkin, and Guinness recorded the expected victories but on balance the most memorable Varsity performances came from six almost unknown athletes who weren't even guaranteed a place on the team three weeks ago.

Lance Aho gave an indication of things to come when he chopped five seconds off his previous best time in the 200-yard butterfly by cruising to seventh place in 2:08.7. Aho then lowered his time for the 200-yard breastroke by eight full seconds in grabbing second place behind Sebben in 2:21.2.

Bill Chisholm swam an excellent 200 butterfly in 2:04.8, just three-tenths behind the winner, Waterloo's Mike Hughes.

Scott Day cut ten seconds off his previous best in the 200-yard individual medley with a clocking of 2:10.0 for ninth place, and later shaved four seconds from his 100-yard freestyle time to finish in 51.0.

Rob Goldberg won the consolation final of the 100-yard backstroke in 2:08.5, almost six seconds faster than his best previous effort, and also finished fourth in the 100 back.

Mike Hibberd was a solid fourth in the 200 free at 1:54.1 and placed sixth in the 500 free.

Jay Steele grabbed second behind Guinness in a somewhat slow 1650 free and then lopped eight seconds off his previous mark in the 500 free with a time of 5:06, good for third place.

Veteran backstroke Russ Farquhar typified the heightened sense of team spirit as he sacrificed his specialities to become a freestyle sprinter. Months of gruelling practices paid off as he helped produce a record of 3:17.6 in the 400 free relay and swam the finishing leg in the victorious medley relay.

Bolstered by this somewhat unexpected support from the lower ranking swimmers, Varsity's four experienced leaders responded with outstanding races.

Captain Jim Adams set a provincial record of 1:44.8 in the 200 freestyle, made a shambles of the 400 freestyle relay with a 47.8 leadoff leg, and won both the 50 freestyle (21.8) and 100 butterfly (53.3).

Mike Guinness added a second in the 500 free and two good relays to his victory in the 1650.

John Sebben won the 200 breastroke, placed fourth in a very tough 100 breast, and came fourth again in the 1650 freestyle.

Dave Wilkin gained a second in the 200 IM, a third in the 100 free and swam the two freestyle relays.

Apart from the promising internal dynamics affecting the performance of the Varsity team, the meet's more visible development centered around Waterloo's solid effort which netted the Warriors eight victories to Varsity's seven.

Varsity coach Robin Campbell seemed pleased with both the closeness of the meet and the performances by his developing swimmers.

"Waterloo's achievements are good for the league, since there can't be much interest when own school repeatedly wins by a landslide," Campbell said.

He admitted to "some surprise" at the times posted by the younger Varsity swimmers, but predicted that with seventeen qualifiers, Blues will "be awfully hard to beat at the CIAU finals."

"We tried a system whereby each swimmer entered one event of his choice, one of my choice, and one which we decided collectively would produce the best result for the team as a whole," Campbell said.

There were some disappointments for Campbell and diving coach John Dickson but Varsity divers Fin Temple and Alex Lau finished second and fifth respectively to qualify for the CIAUs.

Breastroker Nick Rottman gained two sixths, Dave Chutter was somewhat weak following a painful visit to the dentist and Greg Vanular was decidedly off form.

The meet's other excitement came when a league official calmly watered down a promise to send all qualifiers to Laurentian for the national finals.

Fifty OUAA swimmers met the CIAU standards but fifteen minutes before the first event the OUAA athletic directors suddenly refused to pay for more than 25 entries unless the coaches immediately raised $1,200.00.

The swimmers were naturally incensed and there was some talk of boycotting the CIAU meet in protest. However, during a hurried meeting on the deck the coaches managed to pool their financial resources and assorted slush funds for the $1,200.00.

Consequently, despite the athletic directors' decision, all the deserving OUAA athletes will be able to participate in the CIAU finals.

As one swimmer muttered, "It's a real piss-off when you consider that those directors are playing around with students' money, and are supposed to be helping instead of hindering college swimming."

Basketball Blues lose in sudden-death match

By JON FRIED

U. of T.'s basketball season ended last Tuesday night as the Varsity Blues lost to the Laurentian Voyageurs 73-72 in OUA quarter-final, sudden-death play-off action at the Benson Building.

On the preceding Saturday, the Blues defeated the same Laurentian team 89-79 in double overtime in the final regular season game to clinch second place in the OUA eastern division and gain home court advantage for the play-off. The Blues had also taken the season opener against the Voyageurs 80-79 in Sudbury.

The Blues were forced to play catch-up ball from the outset of the play-off contest. Voyageurs slowed the Blues' fast break to a standstill, and penetrated the Blues' defence up the middle effectively. Down by as much as 11 early in the first half, Blues got hot outside shooting from Doug Fox and finished the first 20 minutes trailing by only two points, 32-30.

However, in the second half, Laurentian again quickly extended their leading margin, ignoring 6'7" Paul Mousseau on the base line despite his 14 first-half points, and relying on the outside accuracy of guard Mel Bishop and Don Charuba.

Once again the Blues retaliated and took the lead 63-60 with six minutes remaining. With 15 seconds left Bishop sank a 20-footer to put Laurentian ahead 71-70.

Guard Randy Filinski then brought the ball out of the backcourt for the Blues, looked towards the bench and queried "time out?" Coach John McManus either did not hear him, or made no reply.

A hurried shot by Glen Scott with five seconds left ringed the rim, and again Bishop scored for Laurentian after Charuba pulled down the rebound. Fox scored at the buzzer to leave the Blues one point short, 72-72.

Fox finished the play-off with 22, and was high scorer. Blue's other guard Filinski had 12. Big men Bryan Skyvington, Scott and Frank Cress notched 14, eight and eight, respectively. Avo Albo, Rich Kurczyk, Tony Rudnik, and Bill Birnbaum each contributed two points for the Blues.

Paul Mousseau led Laurentian with 21 points. Bishop finished with 15 and Charuba with 14. Guard Eric Anderson had 10 and Mike Visser 11 for the Voyageurs. Laurentian committed but four fouls and Blues did not go to the foul line in the second half.

In contrast, in Saturday's league contest, the Voyageurs blew two substantial leads during regular time, lost Charuba, who had dominated the game, in the first overtime and Mousseau in the second losing to the Blues 89-79. At full time the score was tied at 68, and at the end of the first overtime it stood 74-74.

Blues were inept at penetrating the middle until Charuba and Mousseau got into foul trouble, as the majority of leading scorer's Glenn Scott's 21 points came from outside. Blues shot a meagre 32% from the floor, whereas Laurentian were good on 49% of their shots.

Bill Birnbaum, who did not make an appearance until overtime, scored the tying basket at 74 in the first overtime, and put the Blues in front to stay at the start of the second, with two quick baskets. Guard Randy Filinski had 15 and Doug Fox 12. Avo Albo and Rich Kurczyk got 10 a piece and Tony Rudnik had four. Frank Cress did not score.

For Laurentian, Charuba left the game with 20. Mel Bishop was good for 16 points, and Mike Visser 15. Paul Mousseau finished with 12 after not scoring in the first half. Jeff Bennett got eight, Mike Heale and Bob Gouley four each off the bench.

In the OUA championship tourney in Ottawa this past weekend, Waterloo Warriors clinched the title by defeating the Voyageurs in the semi-final and the Ottawa Gee-Gees 93-56 in the final. Ottawa previously defeated Windsor Lancers. Laurentian beat the Lancers 74-71 in the consolation match.

Glen Scott soars for a rebound against Laurentian as Randy Filinski (45) watches. Blues' loss ended their season.

Ice Blues lucky to escape with tie

By PAUL CARSON

The hockey Blues completed the regular season Feb. 22 tying Laurentian Voyageurs 3-3 in a tight game Blues might have won but deserved to lose.

The result followed earlier victories over Waterloo (8-4) and Ottawa (6-2), leaving Blues with a record of 18 victories and one tie for the season and yet another first-place finish. Not a bad showing for a team with no less than nine rookies in the starting lineup.

Dave Tatarany, a standout on the 1971-72 Varsity team, was the difference for Laurentian as he robbed his former teammates on several clear breakaways as Blues amassed a 41-27 advantage in shots.

Blues produced their sloppiest effort of the year, replete with inaccurate passing, misdirected shooting and careless defensive play. Voyageurs were chippy but tenacious and might have won the game in the final 20 seconds but Mike Fox shot wide of Jim Campbell in the Varsity net on a clearcut breakaway.

Don Pagnutti wrapped up the eastern division scoring title with a goal and assist to finish with 52 points, narrowly edging Kent Ruhnke and York's Tim Ampleford.

Ivan McFarlane and Ruhnke notched Varsity's other goals; Brian Penrose, Dennis O'Brien and Jim Hanson replied for Laurentian.

It was a different story against the west division leaders in Waterloo Feb 17 as Blues raced to an early lead over the Warriors and then hung on for the victory.

Pagnutti, Ruhnke and McFarlane each scored twice with veterans Warren Anderson and Gord Davies adding the others in the free-scoring game.

Rick Cornacchia had his best night of the season Feb. 15 against Ottawa, scoring two important first period goals and playing well defensively.

Pagnutti also collected two goals; Ruhnke and Ron Harris scored the others. Gee-Gees kept the game close for a while but tired noticeably in the final period, and must have been completely asleep the next day as they lost 4-3 to Ryerson and subsequently missed the playoffs.

Ivan McFarlane banks his backhand shot past Voyageur goalie Dave Tatarany in the Blues' last season game.

U of T wins cross-country

The weekend of the 16th and 17th at Mont Ste. Marie proved to be a productive one for the cross-country ski team. On Saturday the relay team of Ken Sidney, Veli Ninimaa, Dag Furst, and Doug Garfield won the RMC Invitational 4 x 10 Relay.

It was an exciting race for Toronto was third at the end of the first leg, first at the end of the second, and 30 seconds behind Queen's at the end of the third, but Doug Garfield brought it home for Toronto trouncing Queen's anchor man Dyer by two minutes.

On Sunday Carleton hosted the OUAA nordic championships. Doug Garfield took second place and the silver medal. His time of 36:44 over the 10 kilometer course was three seconds behind Daryl Frank (36:41) of Laurentian.

Ken Sidney (6th, 39:31) and Veli Ninimaa (7th, 40:13) turned in excellent performances for Toronto ensuring a team victory over Laurentian, Queen's RMC, Carleton, Guelph and Western. Other Toronto racers were Dag Furst (10th), Tom Best (14th), and Rich Sutcliffe (35th).

With the two victories on the weekend the team finished their intercollegiate races with a perfect record of three victories.

Good fencers make good neighbors

Last weekend, Varsity fencers competed in the OUAAs finals at McMaster.

The foil team of Abu Nazir, Tong Chong and Bernard Tsui captured first place Brock and York were second and third respectively.

The epee team of Dave Hamer, Wing Nip and John Roth could do not better than third place behind Windsor and RMC.

In team sabre, Carleton was first with Windsor and RMC second and third.

In individual competition, Ozols from York captured first place in foil with Abu Nazir fifth.

In individual epee, Ben Joyce of Carleton retained his title while Toronto's Dave Hamer came third. Marc Laviole of Carleton was the champion in sabre.

Social work students' strike Monday

Social work students will go on strike Monday and Tuesday boycotting classes in an effort to get parity on departmental decision-making committees.

"We firmly believe in our right to become 'equal' partners in our education and in the merit of our demands," says a release from the Faculty of Social Work student union.

"It has now become obvious that we must demonstrate our dedication to these rights."

The situation has been bubbling underneath the surface since January and came to a head in a student meeting Tuesday when students decided on the strike action following a lack of progress in talks with faculty.

The student union will be forming a personnel committee to review and make recommendations about appointment, promotion and tenure of members of the teaching faculty and field instructors.

Field instructors are frequently social workers who supervise students doing work in social agencies as part of their studies towards a masters degree in social work.

The student union also plans to form an accreditation committee to prepare an assessment of the educational program to be submitted to the council on social work education this fall.

"In the opinion of the student union of the Faculty of Social Work, the actual accomplishments of the negotiating process have been at best minimal," the student union says.

"It has become clear that the teaching faculty's adherence to a consensus approach to decision-making has resulted in an intolerably slow and insulting response to student initiative.

"They (the faculty) clearly do not want a parity system on any groups, committees or bodies that in fact make and implement decisions."

In the past, while students sat on some of the official faculty committees, the actual decisions about the department were made behind closed doors by faculty alone.

"The teaching faculty accepts without even the most minimal protest, actions taken by the larger university administration which deprives the faculty of its power and autonomy," the students union says.

"We are clearly facing a situation in which the teaching faculty will oppose students, but bow to the edicts of the university administration."

The student bid for parity, climaxing in the call for a strike, came following protracted discussions with the faculty of social work over the last few weeks.

Students had issued a series of demands which amounted to more say for students in decision-making, and waited for a written reply.

Key issues for students involve the flexibility of the courses students take as well as involvement in decision-making.

At present courses offer little input in which subjects the student may take towards the masters degree.

All those tenured professors and Simcoe Hall bureaucrats who still have to bring their cars downtown might find themselves common criminals, if parking places are cut.

UTFA wants to preserve closed shop

By ANDREW FALUDY

What emerges most clearly from the jungle of figures just published by the U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) is tenured faculty members do not like the presence of untenured members or students on tenure committees.

It also seems they would gleefully sacrifice their less entrenched colleagues in case of financial crisis, irrespective of academic prowess.

The returns represent the views of 660 faculty members distributed over the St. George campus and Scarborough Erindale colleges.

The 600 returns are 43 per cent of the total 1,550 faculty members.

One of the questions asked in the survey tested faculty members' reactions to the addition of students to tenure committees.

Of those surveyed, 64 per cent said the presence of an undergraduate student on a tenure committee was unacceptable. On the question of graduate students on these committees, the split was 50-50.

However, faculty preferred an untenured member of their own department on the tenure committee (59 per cent in favor) to the presence of an untenured member from another department (62 per cent against).

Yes—untenured faculty members sure don't have it easy these days. In case of financial crisis, budget cuts and the like, they would be Ontario Grade No 1 for the slaughter according to their colleagues.

Asked the question, if, in the event that dismissals had to take place for fiscal reasons, 52 per cent said they should take place first among untenured staff.

Only 48 per cent felt dismissals should take place on academic grounds, regardless of actual position.

No prizes will be given for guessing who it was that preferred to dismiss untenured members regardless of achievement.

The untenured members voted 69 per cent in favor of dismissal on academic grounds alone, the highest percentage in the breakdown of the figures.

But 60 per cent of the full professors and 47 per cent of the associate professors were in favor of dismissal first from among untenured staff.

The survey also examined the various criteria which have been proposed for tenure decisions. Both tenured and untenured staff agreed that effectiveness in teaching was the most important criterion. Of those questioned, 98.9 found this to be important.

However, demonstration of scholarly achievement is a close second with 98.7 per cent thinking this to be necessary.

Hygiene proposal attacked

By RANDY ROBERTSON

A recommendation the School of Hygiene become the third division of the Faculty of Medicine in order to remedy its deficit and enrolment problems may in fact do very little to solve those problems.

The new structural proposal, the basis of a report presented by a task force of the academic affairs committee and the planning and resources committee to their joint meeting Tuesday was severely attacked for this reason by a number of committee members.

Task force chairman Chaires Hanly was forced to admit no survey has been made whether more students will become interested in community health if it is made a Faculty of Medicine division.

"But is it the considered judgement of the task force," he said, "that those students whose career possibilities are frustrated" those students who are unable to get into clinical sciences and basic sciences, the other two divisions of the Faculty of Medicine—"will be interested."

"It should be possible to design highly attractive programs to which highly qualified students can come and from which they can go out into the community to become involved in work situations which will deal with these problems and in so doing establish further the reputation which the School of Hygiene already has."

He said mention had been made in talks with Ontario government officials of the need for people trained in middle management positions to research into the ways in which health services are being organized and delivered, and of the need for specialists in population medicine to head up medical planning and utilization of community medical resources and to assist with the new community resource centres the provincial government has committed itself to.

The School of Hygiene's two big problems are related.

The more students the faculty has enrolled within its own division the more basic income units (BIU)—the money per student it receives from the provincial government—it is credited with.

The school enrolls only graduate students.

But the undergraduate teaching service it provides for other divisions—particularly the Faculty of Arts and Science—accounts for nearly half of the school's BIU income.

Yet this teaching is mostly in the department of microbiology (one of the school's seven departments) and is not related to public health per se.

The operating deficit of the School, without any allowance for central university services and related overhead costs is presently $159,799.

The solution is to attract more graduate students to the core programs. But then this is also the problem.

Academic affairs committee member C.B. Macpherson wondered since there are limitations to the number of people presently allowed into the Faculty of Medicine, whether this limitation wouldn't also apply to community health if it became a division of the faculty.

A number of committee members resented it was the Faculty of Medicine which was to co-opt the School of Hygiene.

An Academic affairs committee member wanted to know since it is the role of community health graduates to study medicine independently and critically how it can properly be placed in the Faculty of Medicine.

He characterised pharmacy as "one of the biggest spenders in the field of community health" and suggested it and the School of Hygiene exist together in a free-standing school of health sciences.

The committee in advocating union with the Faculty of Medicine rejected just such a proposal, as well as a number of others.

Hanly noted the view is often expressed that community health should be neutral if it is to provide its services to all the medical professions fairly.

Hanly described such an attitude as a reflection of "professional warfare."

Hanly noted there already is a good working relationship between the faculty and the school through service teaching and cross-appointments.

The report proposes clinical sciences strongly involve themselves with public health once it is made a division.

Academic Affairs committee member William Dunphy noted there is a "crunch" on the resources of the clinical sciences, "where there is lots of space in an absolute sense."

St. Mike's president John Kelly wondered if the task force was not simply shifting the school's deficit from the school to the Faculty of Medicine.

Since the major thrust of the school is apparently to be in research and administration committee members wondered why the school should not become part of the School of Management Studies.

Hanly said the structure the task force approved "was not intended to be a panacea," and that we have not hung our recommendations on an easy way out—through administrative change—more students—more money."

The report notes the "academic divisions of the university are unlike department stores in which each department is expected to show a profit... it is in the total concept that the university must attempt to maximize BIUs."

There are other more important benefits, Hanly said. "Through integration, participation, cross-appointments, the expertise of the clinical sciences will be brought to bear on service health areas."

School of Hygiene head G.H. Beeton noted if the Planning and resources committee was concerned too much with looking at BIU revenue "we must remember what happened to Food Sciences."

Labour victory likely in Britain

The British Labour party has won a victory in the British election, but the Liberals may hold the balance of power in the next parliament with Labour just short of the magic 318 seats for a majority.

At press time the Labour lead was secure with Labour (239) the conservatives (159) liberals (5) and 225 to come. Labour is also leading in the popular vote with 42 per cent to the Conservatives 37 per cent and the Liberals 20 per cent in a heavy turn out.

The defeat is a repudiation of Conservative leader Ted Heath's anti-union policies and shows significant support for the striking miners and the Labour policy of nationalization of energy resources.

The Labour party has also vowed to renegotiate the common market agreement and repeal the controversial industrial relations act.

Estimates vary on value of SMC land

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Metro parks committee voted yesterday to ask the borough of York and the city of Toronto to conduct an appraisal of the land owned by St. Michael's college which falls within the two municipalities.

Estimates of the value of the land have ranged between $1 million and $4.25 million.

The vote followed a long series of deputations in which representative of the Forest Hill Residents' Association, and other citizens groups asked the committee to purchase the 10 acre site for park purposes.

The St. Mike's land borders the Cedarvale-Nordheimer ravine through which the Spadina rapid transit line will pass. At present, the site is covered with land fill and is used as a playing field.

St. Mike's has given first option on purchase of the land to Cadillac development Corp., which for $4.25 million wishes to erect a medium-rise, low density housing scheme.

The Cadillac purchase is contingent on receiving a zoning favorable to the development. At present, the zoning permits only single family houses, in Toronto and two-family housing and duplexes in York.

Tommy Thompson, Metro parks commissioner, has recommended Metro take no action on the proposal to buy the land. Yesterday's vote left the door open for a possible future purchase of the site, although at the last meeting of the committee, few members spoke in favour of purchase.

The committee heard widely differing estimates of the value of the land. Sheldon Godfrey, a spokesman for the residents suggested the value of the land under its present zoning was between $1 million and $1.5 million.

A Cadillac lawyer, Allan Leibel, suggested the "base price" of the land to be $4.25 million, although St. Mike's has said it arrived at the figure based on high density development of the land.

Godfrey told the committee Metro had an obligation to buy the land because it covered two municipalities, was in an area of intense high-rise development, and would border the Metro-oriented rapid transit line.

Godfrey warned the committee "this is an opportunity that won't repeat itself."

Bert Stollard, a local resident, told the committee the threat of earthquakes made the availability of flat, open land a necessity. His petition was not received in the spirit he intended.

Forest Hill residents' lawyer Irving Pasternak states case, while Alderman David Smith dreams.

Ward II aldermen Anne Johnston and David Smith both spoke in favour of the residents.

Smith told the committee the area was "grossly under-represented" in parkland. He also said it was possible the province would agree to help fund the purchase, as its involvement with the purchase of Rattray Marsh in Mississauga had set a precedent.

Johnston told the committee the land had a Metro-wide availability, and had an obligation to purchase it, especially since local residents were so strongly in favour of it.

Representatives of both Cadillac and St. Mike's pleaded with the committee to come to a decision on purchase of the land soon, with St. Mike's indicating it was anxious to dispose of the property.

Library worker fired in personality clash

By BOB BETTSOON

The Robarts Library management has come under fire from the library workers' union CUPE local 1230 for the Wednesday firing of a probationary worker for personal reasons.

According to union clerk steward Judy D'Arcy, library chief-typist Sonja Lang was fired for not getting along well with her supervisor Margaret Gibb.

According to the union, Lang was not fired for her work but because she did not get along with Gibb.

Lang was told when she was fired she had neglected to smile, say good morning, or be friendly to Gibb, said D'Arcy and steward-at-large Gail Cochrane yesterday.

The union is now appealing with a policy grievance. It could not file personal grievance because as a probationary employee Lang is not eligible for that procedure.

She was fired the day before she could have filed a personal grievance. D'Arcy commented it was like firing a person then getting every last minute of work out of them.

Her fellow workers were not happy with the firing and disagreed with the attitude of the supervisors. They wrote a letter saying the same charges could be made of anyone and called the firing a direct threat "to all of us."

D'Arcy said: "We feel an employee, even a probationary employee, is fired because of a personality clause, it sets a bad precedent for all employees."

After the initial firing, the stewards went with Lang to the department head, Phyllis Peach, to find out the reasons for the firing.

There was no action. Finally after a petition, a letter and further union pressure for a meeting, they finally received a letter documenting alleged reasons for the firing.

Many of these, D'Arcy says, are small and others are lies, which could be confirmed by Lang's fellow employees who can vouch for her good work.

The letter states she was late to work on several occasions. She was. She lives out in Etobicoke, said D'Arcy, and was late by five minutes in several snow storms.

It also notes two of her sick days were Fridays, an unsubstantiated veiled accusation she was taking a long weekend.

An appeal to head of library personnel Michael McNeill also failed. He told the union he was not responsible for justifying the firing.

The union will emphasize this as a reason for a demand for the right to file grievance procedures for all employees. The university has resisted the unionization of probationary and part-time workers.

A final appeal to Governing Council member and labor-management relations man John Parker also failed. Parker said he would expect this kind of action from a business corporation, not the university.

D'Arcy observed the university was not different from a capitalist corporation.

The library workers have been faced with continual management hostility since the Robarts Library opened. They have complained about the lack of a decent cafeteria, the lights, the air and the drabness of their work areas.

D'Arcy said the union is also going to raise the issue in the governing council campaign for library worker Drew Millar who is fighting Parker for the administrative staff seat. Millar is calling Parker a management representative, who doesn't represent the workers' interests.

Let's have some ideas, eh! Spend U of T $ and win!

The Varsity is launching a gala contest today for students to recommend what U of T should do with the extra $2 million in provincial government grants U of T is getting starting in the fall of 1974.

Prizes include free subscriptions to the Varsity mailed to various places in the world, a bottle of warm beer, a stale cigar and a kite to fly in front of Simcoe Hall.

Restricted to students only, entries may be made as often as you want in each of two categories: Serious Suggestions and Trivial Suggestions. Each entry must specify which category.

Each entry must be 50 words or less, double-spaced, typewritten and signed with the student's ATL number included. Libel, slander and contempt of court automatically disqualified.

Voting members of the Varsity staff are disqualified.

Deadline for submission is 3 pm Monday March 18. An impartial jury of career Varsity hacks will decide the winners who will be announced in the March 20 issue which will include the winning submissions and runners-up.

So contestants will have a rough idea of the sorts of suggestions for U of T's $2 million here are a few possible ideas.

Serious Suggestions: Buy books for the Robarts Library; increase the wages of non-academic employees; build a swimming pool in the new addition to the Benson Building.

Trivial Suggestions: building an indoor heated swimming pool for John Evans; transfer the staff of the Clarke Institute to Simcoe Hall; distribute a free pound of marijuana to all tenured faculty members.

The purpose of this contest is to encourage Simcoe Hall to use a little creative thinking in deciding what to do with the money.

So far Simcoe Hall's response has not been riddled with an abundance of terribly good or bad ideas. Students should give them a choice.

In a carefully typed press release, University president John Evans had only this to say about the use of the extra $2 million:

"We are gratified the province has raised its level of contribution above the previously announced level, in view of the very rapid inflation of costs in all sectors of the university which is occurring at the present time."

Business affairs vice-president Alex Rankin was a little more to the point: "Thank God for it."

Rankin's department will have some say in the use of the money and will administer whatever decision evolves for the money. Rankin did suggest some of the money go to the library.

Prizes in the Varsity's contest will be given as follows:

Serious Suggestions Category: First prize—one free subscription to the Varsity mailed to anywhere in the world; Second prize—two free subscriptions of the Varsity mailed to anywhere in Canada; Third prize—three free subscriptions to the Varsity mailed to anywhere in Ontario. Baby prize—a night out with Bob Gauthier.

Trivial Suggestions Category: First prize—a kite to fly in front of Simcoe Hall (supply your own string); Second prize—one bottle of warm beer; Third prize—a stale cigar.

Runners-up in each category will receive a "Sincere Thank You." A copy of the March 20 issue of the Varsity including the winning suggestions will be mailed to Governing Council's budget committee, the committee deciding what to do with the extra $2 million.

There is no guarantee implied the committee will listen to these student suggestions.

It looks like a Labour victory over one and back to the bath tub for Grocer. Heath Around to help the good ship Varsity tonight were Art Mosas, Katherine Rowcliffe, David Simmonds, Heather Sanglins, Bob Bettson, Maurizio Ceccarelli, Gilde Oran, Anne Healy, Randy and Marg Robertson, "sheepish" Faludy, Igor, and perennial Desk McFuck.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Osborn Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Some nominees for Governing Council considered resigning in order to force another election. However, faced with legal pressure Simcoe Hall decided to allow Peter Jarrett to stand for election. The administration should reinstate Laurence Colman also.

Powerless students kicked when they're down

Simcoe Hall will mail out ballots today for its third annual Governing Council elections, aware that the election it is trying to carry out is not legal under the terms of the U of T Act, 1971.

This startling fact was revealed Tuesday when the Students' Administrative Council's solicitors, Osler, Hoskin, Harcourt presented the SAC with a decision based on the study of certain key documents provided it.

The administration is once again showing the university community why it cannot be trusted; it is attempting to deal with students, and, in this case, the whole university system, in bad faith.

Although chairwoman of the election overseers committee, Marnie Paikin, will probably once again accuse SAC and the Varsity of engaging in a campaign of systematic innuendo, she will have trouble slandering a prestigious law firm in quite the same manner.

(Paikin, one might recall, is also chairwoman of the internal affairs committee this academic year, and one of the key figures responsible for the university's latest gift to students—the discipline code.)

Problems first arose last week when Paikin's elections overseers committee decided to disqualify two undergraduate students from running in their constituencies in the Governing Council elections. The two students, Laurie Colman and Peter Jarrett took their complaints to the Students' Administrative Council, which quickly notified its lawyers to prepare an opinion on the administration's decision. After studying the University of Toronto Act, 1971, and certain other pertinent documentation, Osler, Hoskin, Harcourt gave the opinion that the Governing Council's methods of election procedure did not conform to its powers under the U of T Act.

The administration had not only been caught red-faced, but also red-handed.

Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt's statement said, "Power to determine the manner and procedure of election of its members and conduct of such elections is conferred on the Governing Council by Section 2 (14) of the U of T Act, 1971. By Section 2(15) of the same Act the Governing Council is required to pass by-laws regulating the exercise of its powers and the calling and conduct of its meetings and its decisions are required to be made by resolutions passed at its meetings."

Unfortunately for the administration the law firm continues: "The document entitled 'Election Guidelines' appears to have been approved by resolution of the Governing Council but we have seen no by-law purporting to regulate the manner and procedure of elections and the conduct of elections.

Accordingly, it appears that the Governing Council has not properly exercised its power to determine the manner and procedure of election of its members and as a result there was no authority under which nominations could be either called for or rejected."

Furthermore, "the document entitled 'Election Guidelines' does not have the force of a by-law; still less does the document entitled 'Nomination Form.' It is our opinion that the procedure whereby the Spring, 1974 elections are supposed to be held, could be challenged by an action for declaratory and injunctive relief under the Judicial Review Procedure Act.

"We do not doubt that the Council could rectify its failure properly to exercise its power by enacting a by-law having retro-active effect. However, the requirements of section 76 of By-Law No. 2 of the Governing Council could not be met before the date of the proposed election.

"If the elections are in any event held, it may therefore be open to a person aggrieved by the nominations procedure to object to such elections as being held without authority."

The law firm "also considered what would be the position if it were assumed that by the adoption of the Election Guidelines, the Governing Council had properly exercised its powers respecting the manner and procedure of elections."

Osler, Hoskin Harcourt concluded in Peter Jarrett's case that "in notifying Mr. Jarrett of the rejection of his nomination the election overseers relied on certain requirements stated in the Nomination Form. It is our view that they were in fact and in law without authority to reject Mr. Jarrett's nomination on the grounds given."

It was this opinion that probably caused Paikin and crew to reverse their biased and unqualified decision.

Jarrett had been disqualified because two of his nominators made simple numerical errors in putting their ATL numbers on the nomination forms. SAC's lawyers argued that "the Election Guidelines do not require the inscription of an ATL number on a Nomination Form for a nomination to be effective. The requirement of ATL numbers made in the nomination form therefore can be considered as affecting only the question of the identity of a nominator and not any question as to the validity of the act of nomination."

And, since, "since there was obviously no doubt as to the identity of the two nominators who misinscribed their ATL numbers on Jarrett's nomination, nor as to their status to be nominators, we cannot see that there was any grounds for rejection of that nomination."

Laurie Colman's nomination could have been rejected on technical grounds if the Governing Council had properly exercised its power. But it didn't.

The administration has refused to accept Colman's nomination, although it did reconsider and accept Jarrett's.

The law firm engaged by SAC terms the treatment of Colman's nomination as "grossly unfair." We can only agree.

The gracious thing for the Governing Council to do would be to accept Colman's nomination, especially since the administration is wrong. If Simcoe Hall chooses to leave Colman out, Colman and SAC should seriously consider the possibility of an injunction to stop the elections.

The administration should be satisfied that it has a majority on the Governing Council — enough to put students "in their places" without resorting to underhanded tricks.

It seems that those who hold the power like to kick their opponents even when they're down.

Marnie Paikin comes from Hamilton. She was brought in by John R. Evans when he first came to this university. It would not be incorrect to call her his "front woman".

The way Paikin and her elections committee have been acting lately we would like to suggest that she be retired back to Hamilton. She would make a fine contribution to the Hamilton police force.

Greeks tell of junta torture

Greece is the only country in Europe today in which concentration camps for political prisoners are still in operation. They were reopened last November by the new fascist dictators so that they might complete the work of their predecessors who were forced by Greek and world public opinion to close them.

The island concentration camp Yura (Yaros) was opened in 1947 during the civil war and closed down three years later. During those years an orgy of torture and atrocities were committed against thousands of Greek citizens representing a broad spectrum of political views. This barren island is found amidst the tourist resort islands of the Aegean Sea. It has no water or vegetation. It has been called the Dachau of the Mediterranean.

Yaros was first used by the Roman Emperor Syllas, about 80 BC who sent 80,000 political opponents to its inhospitable rocky shores, most of whom died from starvation and illness. Louis Lacroix writes: "This is a horrible uninhabitable rock. There was there a city, according to the account of Pliny, but its inhabitants were driven off by the rats, which to this day are still the lords of the island. And even the rats were undernourished."

After the era of Emperor Syllas the island was used again in 1921 as a prison for 150 dissident Greek soldiers. Their imprisonment lasted 20 days. In 1936 the Greek dictator Ioannis Metaxas thought of using this island for political exiles, but he was prevented from doing so by the Greek health authorities. It was used though for a few years, in 1947, by the so-called democratic governments of Greece at that time.

In 1967 it was reopened by the junta of the colonels. From then on, some of Greece's most patriotic sons suffered on this hostile rock. On the last day of 1973, the new dictatorship opened Yura again, and 75 political prisoners were sent there.

Yura is one aspect of life in Greece today. This aspect also includes secret police, detention camps, prisons, gendarmerie and police quarters, endorsement files on every Greek citizen and all the other attributes of a fascist police state. The recent arrests demonstrate that a new wave of terror has begun. Two well known trade union leaders, Antonis Ambatielos and Nikos Kaloudis, have been arrested within the past week, along with hundreds of others including students and women. It is feared that those now under arrest may face the firing squad or the prospect of life in Yura.

As in the past, the mobilization of world opinion has been instrumental in saving Greek patriots from the firing squad and also in closing down the concentration camps. Student groups can be very influential and speak with a strong voice especially in solidarity with students from other countries.

World opinion is being mobilized. Add your voice to the struggle for the life and freedom of Greek political prisoners.

Disqualification called 'petty'

I am taking this opportunity to register a complaint against the overseers of the Governing Council election for their treatment of Laurence Colman's nomination for Governing Council. The nomination was rejected because of my signature on the application. My signature invalidated the nomination because I am a part-time student and Laurie was running for a full-time undergraduate position.

The background to the situation is as follows. I had intended to return to university this year as a full-time student, and had been in residence two weeks when I learned that I could only return as a part-time student registered in day classes as a "Special Student". I have been allowed to remain in residence at New College, and have also maintained my position on the New College Student Council, a position I was elected to last year. Consequently, as I have only been an acquaintance of Laurie Colman, there was no reason for him to believe that I was not a full-time student. I signed his nomination form in good faith believing that the purpose of the signatures was only to testify to a belief that the candidate would take the whole issue of nomination seriously.

The nomination form also included two ATL numbers which, according to the election overseers were not the correct ones for the names given. One number was later proven to be correct, but it happened that the individual used his middle name to sign the nomination. The overseers claimed the number invalid, but they had not checked the student's signature with the one on record at Simcoe Hall. In the case of the other student, he had only made an error of one digit, an error which I'm sure many students have made at one time in their careers. In any case, the validity of discrediting a nomination because of an error in an ATL number has been overruled by the committee itself, which on February 26 ruled that another student who had been invalidated for election for the Governing Council because of two incorrect ATL numbers, was permitted to continue his campaign. This means that Laurence Colman's application was rejected due to the presence of one signature which, to the best of his knowledge, was that of a full-time student. I find this treatment petty and unfair.

Smith rises to Evans' defence

What kind of man reads Varsity? Someone who expects to read well-written, well-researched material presented with some semblance of maturity. Not wishing to appear as an apologist for the actions of John Evans I must express my disappointment in the judgement of the editorial staff of the Varsity. Ryerson approves OFS hike

By ART MOSES

Students at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute overwhelmingly approved the proposed fee increase Wednesday for the Ontario Federation of Students.

With more than 25 per cent of eligible students voting, 1,411 voted in favor of the $1.50 per student direct levy which would replace the OFS fee of 40 cents per student which now comes from student council treasuries. There were 443 students opposed.

University of Toronto students will vote on the same question during the SAC presidential elections March 13 and 14.

The new fee structure is designed to allow OFS to hire more staff to enable it to become a more effective lobby for students at the provincial level.

The current OFS staff consists of three people who must do research, communicate with member student councils and students, and lobby the government themselves.

Recent indications that Queen's

Park may increase tuition fees or alter student aid schemes made the status of OFS a more pressing issue. The turnout for Ryerson's referendum was higher than usual.

The vote ran concurrently with student union elections in which candidates had to take stands on the issue: Ryerson student union president Marc Belanger said.

"We did an awful lot of work on the referendum," he said. "We talked to people in classes and hallways and distributed leaflets and posters. But it wasn't even an uphill battle."

"As soon as students heard the arguments for a stronger OFS, and realized tuition fees could be increased, there was no problem at all. Students realize we need a strong provincial lobby."

Last week students at the University of Western Ontario voted 1,675 to 855 in favor of the $1.50 OFS fee.

At the same time, Carleton University, where the student council did little campaigning, students turned down the fee increase by a narrow margin.

Students at St. Patrick's College in Ottawa had earlier voted for the fee increase. OFS officials indicate another vote will be held at Carleton if students elsewhere approve a new fee.

Referenda will be held at Glendon College and at Lakehead University about the same time as the U of T vote. Other campuses plan their referenda for next fall.

Sticky wickets for this cricketer

The back shelves of the Varsity's review office at 91 St. George are, to my knowledge, never cleaned or sorted through.

Which makes them interesting. For example, there's a brown paper bag that still contains a washcloth, toothbrush, and other assorted personal paraphernalia belonging to a certain former Varsity Staffer.

And then there's that bookman's delight, 46 Not Out, by R. C. Robertson-Glasgow, published back in 1954 in a limited edition by the Sportsman's Book Club of London. It's an autobiography dealing mainly with R.C. R-G's life in the world of cricket, both as a player and as (shades of Clark Kent) a journalist writing about it. Which fascinates me, since if there are three things I've never been quite able to understand, they're cricket, the hyphenated upper-class British, and journalists.

Of course, there's a Canadian angle, too, even if the reference is a bit perfunctory.

"Fifteen months later he fell dead, still talking, in the streets of Toronto. The old pain had won. It was not Madeira, nor the after-supper pipe, but acute angina pectoris. Something just had to burst.

"Be grandfathers as they may, I was fresh, too ready on the quack, and green, oh, very green. On the third day at school, I walked into the headmaster's study, sat down in his best chair, and asked him if he could sell me a second-hand tennis ball."

If the slight hint of scandal in the title of the chapter Caruso and Auntie Bug comes to naught (the two, alas, never met), at least the stiff upper lip is kept in proportion — death, after all, comes to everyone, while a good cricket match is an occasion to be savoured:

"In the summer of 1916 I captained the Under Sixteen cricket eleven against Christ's Hospital and St. Paul's. The School first eleven had a great win, by 13 runs, over Winchester, and; in their match against the Artists' Rifles, I first had my eyes opened to what batting could be, by a beautiful 90 from D. J. Knight. He and his partner, A. Hartley of Lancashire, put over 100 for the first wicket. Hartley was killed in France a month before the Armistice of 1918. I have the fancy that Knight was caught in the deep off the slow left-hander, J. B. Beck. Beck played little cricket afterwards, but he reached eminence in golf..."

"Zounds! I've stepped on some birdshit."

Not that there is anything wrong with the great (and not-so-great) cricket matches of the past. There are a lot of pre-expansion hockey games worth re-calling, too.

But there's something about the peculiar educated illiteracy and imbecility of the upper-class English that is more than simply harmlessly ludicrous, even from this side of the Atlantic. There comes a point when you realize that all that amusing emotional stuck-up-ness — "these days of candour about sex and reticence about social status" — covers an incapacity to have human relations. The diffident comments about people "who use Economics as a substitute for God" emerge as a cover for the most brutal, if refined, kind of neanderthal reaction. It must be a peculiar emotional climate indeed that makes people come all unstuck over, of all things, the impending wedding of some supercilious sexless princess whom you can't imagine spreading her legs except when she's sitting on her horse.

It's a pity that cricket should still have an image of being dominated by people such as these. Another cricket memoir, Beyond a Boundary, by C.L.R. James, (1963), obtainable from Third World Books and Crafts, James, a West Indian cricketer better known as a leading marxist theoretician, talks about the sport in a very different way. James talks about the class and colour distinctions that mark the world of cricket, the class conflict that enters into the play of many important matches. But he also talks about the robust vigour of the game, with its origins in the undisciplined days of pre-industrial England. "Cricket", he says, "is first and foremost a dramatic spectacle. It belongs with the theatre, ballet, opera, and the dance." It draws on "the elemental human activities, qualities, and emotions — attacks, defence, courage, gallantry, steadfastness, grandeur, ruse."

Or, in simpler terms, it's a damn good game. It's too bad that it has practically come to epitomize snobbery.

Bagel Factory pix outshine wordsmith's tricks: gilding the lily with David Shaw

I set out to read Saturday Night at the Bagel Factory and found myself staring at the illustrations instead. David Shaw's drawing have the kind of subtlety which I associate with the work of great book illustrators such as Arthur Rackham. There is something rather nightmarish about the rigid, slightly overweight figures with their fried-egg eyes. But some of the figures are really delightful, and some show real genius. I ended up by deciding to persuade The Varsity to devote a page to Shaw and his work.

David John Shaw was born in London, England in 1947. He came to Toronto with his parents in 1954, and graduated from the Ontario College of Art in 1969.

Since graduating, he has worked as a designer and illustrator at the publisher McClelland and Stewart, and at a small local design studio, as well as doing freelance work. He is married but has no children.

I talked to Shaw in his Toronto apartment over shepherd's pie and broccoli. He said that he liked publishing because of the diversity. Each book demands a different treatment, and the treatment is more or less his own.

By contrast, illustrations for magazines and advertising must literally follow lines dictated by New York. Of his short career in advertising, he remembers mainly the endless rendering of Pepsi Cola bottles.

Publishing does have its limitations though. The artist's drawings must be reproducible. Colour illustrations are very rare in Canadian publishing because of the tight budgets. The book format restricts the size and shape of the work.

The ultimate situation for a Canadian illustrator such as Shaw is apparently the private studio, where the artist(s) can "pick and choose" their freelance work. "But that could only work," said Shaw, "if two hundred people didn't decide to do the same thing at the same time".

"It's incredible the number of people who are looking for work these days," said Shaw, "but most of them have just graduated, and don't really know what's going on, or the kind of thing they want to do."

"Do you get very many of them coming to McClelland and Stewart?"

"Mm. Hm. It varies. There aren't quite so many in the winter. We've several people call up and make an appointment. But when they look us up on a map and see how far they have to come, they call up and ask whether it's worth the effort. In most cases it isn't."

"There just isn't as much illustrating being done for Canadian books now. 1967 was a giant year for illustrated Canadians, but things have slackened off since then. The only area where there has been an upsurge is in educational books, which we don't do."

"Okay. Here it comes. Who are your heroes?"

"Rackham. Beardsley. Some contemporary New York people whose influence I'm trying to shake. I got into them (the New York people) at the Art College. Actually, we had very little exposure to what was being done in Canada, except from people who were illustrating themselves, like Franklin Arbuckle and Gerry Sevier."

"The interest in Rackham is really because of the detail which he managed to pack into a picture. Beardsley was someone who was really able to work with the limitations of books."

"The New York influence I'm trying to shake is a group called the Push Pin Studio. It's mostly the shapes of things. I use their cloud shape for my hair shape. Their work is kind of electric anyway. They were responsible for the Art Nouveau revival and the Twenties revival. Push Pin just carried these tendencies further."

"What are you moving toward?"

"A looser kind of drawing. Releasing some of the control that I've got on the drawing at the moment. I visualise using gold effect is almost like I'm putting in backgrounds. Subliminal landscapes."

"John Robert Colombo once accused you of gilding the lily. How would you reply to that?"

"Sometimes it's necessary to gild the lily, or the thing won't sell."

"But how important is book design and illustration as an art form?"

"I would like to see a return to the period when book illustration really was important. Like Durer, outlines and filling in the shapes; a memory of some of the things I saw in Italy. The only thing that stops me from changing is that I keep coming up with new methods of doing the same thing, such as my latest Morse Code drawings."

Illustration for "Sam's Birthday Party"

"Morse code drawings?"

"A very elaborate drawing, with the lines — how do you describe Morse Code? — dot dash dot dash."

"What's the effect? uh, purpose?"

"I don't know if it has any purpose yet. It has an accidental quality that I like. You have to work very close to control the thing, to get the lines even. The I'd even go back as far as the illuminated manuscripts. William Morris, Beardsley."

"In other words, individuals have proved that it can be important."

"Mm. Hm."

P.S. If you are male, bored and a regular reader of Weekend Magazine and Playboy you will probably enjoy the eighteen stories in Saturday Night at the Bagel Factory.

Otherwise, don't bother.

Stunning new music at bargain prices

Rochberg: String Quartet #3
Concord String Quartet
Nonesuch H-71283

William Bolcom: Black Host
William Albright: Organbook II
William Albright, Organ
Nonesuch H-71280

Nonesuch Records, the classical record arm of media octopus Warner-Electra-Atlantic, continues to be one of the most amazing economic performers on the entire entertainment scene. With steady regularity, they put out disc after disc of imaginative music, some of it in the warhorse class, but a surprising amount in the avant-garde at the incredible rate of $3.49 a disc, list. These aren't re-releases; they're original performances and recordings, usually up to the standards set by the records costing in these vinyl-"shortage" times seven clams.

Two new releases from these fine folks highlight this: George Rochberg's Quartet No. 3, given an absolutely stunning performance by the Concord String Quartet, and a disc of new music for organ by William Albright.

When most people think of the organ, it's Bach they have in mind, but in fact, the organ has been in the throes of a mini-renaissance for the past few years in the hands of several dedicated avant-garde crazies. Avant-garde music has garnered a terrible reputation over the past 20 years, usually being accused of dullness, incomprehensible sounds, and an excessive dependence on theory and not enough on the actual music. It's always been my contention that the best of the new music is highly listenable, and this new collection of organ music seems to bear that out.

William Bolcom (who recently played on another fine Nonesuch disc of Gershwin tunes) has written a piece well suited to these diabolical times in Black Host, for organ, percussion and tape. It's a hard piece to describe, with everything from a Joplin-style ragtime to a crashing finale of overlaid radio voices, tympani and thundering pedal tones from the organ. Bolcom is a real entertainer, with more than a little flair for joking about, and it's all for the good in this piece.

Albright's "Organbook II" (the title seems to harken back to Bach, who modestly titled his monumental organ works Organ Books, meant as finger exercises) is subtler, and not as entertaining on the surface as Black Host. Rather than manipulate melody and harmony, Albright works in sonorities and blocks of sound. The organ is a remarkably well-suited instrument for this kind of writing, because each of the thousands of pipes can be set up to meet whatever sound requirements the composer has.

Albright must have read the Exorcist or some such novel while writing this, for like Bolcom, there's a satanic air to the music, even extending to the titles of the sections. Marked "Night Procession", "Toccata Satanique" and "Last Rites", the sections wouldn't be out of place at a concert of Yes or ELP. The last part ends in a remarkably effective way, building up a swirling pool of static and intermittent squawks from the organ for some eight minutes. The long crescendo is handled in a very gradual manner, though, so that one becomes used to it as it moves along. The end is a simple termination of the sound—a device so powerful that its effect cannot be described in words. Check out this disc at the Edward Johnson Building's record library if you don't care to buy it; if you're a contemporary music fan, don't hesitate.

The other release from Nonesuch is George Rochberg's String Quartet #3, which in its own way is as remarkable a departure from convention as were the two organ pieces. Prior to this 1972 composition, Rochberg was primarily known as a member of the serialist school, but this quartet marks a dramatic return to tonality, melody and simply beautiful orchestration. He has learned the tricks of getting a massively orchestral sound out of the four members of the ensemble, which was the greatest change in writing for quartet in the last 150 years. Yet the music has a driving, insistent air about it, from the opening march section to the final scherzo.

The crowning touch of the work, the "variations," announces Rochberg's return to tonality and this movement so resembles a piece by Mozart or Beethoven that it might not even seem out of place in one of their great compositions.

This is probably one of the most important works of the decade, a real trail-blazer for the works to come from the composers of today. The Concord Quartet, who commissioned the work first performed the piece and they are the logical choice for a premiere recording. As with the organ disc, this is an important, valuable recording for the fan of contemporary music. Without a doubt, this is where music is headed at the present moment.

As I said at the beginning, the most encouraging thing about both the records is the price. At $3.49, you really can't go wrong. The sonics are perfect, and if Nonesuch can do it, why can't the other record companies.

Happy-ending fables haven't lost their appeal

Sometimes you go to a movie for the message, or the film technique, or the talents of a particular actor, director or writer. But Cinderella Liberty, at the Towne Cinema, is the type of movie you go to for fun.

It's a traditional, tender-hearted, sad and funny film. It could have even been trite—but it's not.

The old fashioned boy meets girl story has a bit of an unlikely twist when the "boy" is a sailor on leave who wants to get laid. The "girl" Maggie (Marsha Mason) is a "downtown, champagne-cocktail-sipping, cockteasing, barroom whore", as John Baggs Jr.'s (James Caan) commanding officer describes her.

To top that off, the barroom whore is also the mother of a gutsy 11-year-old son, Doug (Kirk Calloway) who wins the heart and sympathy of Baggs.

It may sound melodramatic—but it is light and moving, entertaining and enjoyable. The characters are portrayed as people instead of types. They are human beings caught up in their situation.

Sure it's a bit idealistic that a sailor out to get laid should fall in love with his whore. But then, this is a romantic film.

And yet in the midst of this romanticism are small, contrasting touches of realism: a ruthless welfare worker looking for excuses to cut off the welfare that supports Doug; a navy bureaucracy that loses Baggs' record so that the navy refuses to recognize Baggs' marriage to Maggie.

If one theme runs through this film, it is the theme of loneliness and isolation, of everyone's need for companionship and the need to be wanted. Even Doug—gutsy, hard, self-reliant—can't help but respond to the sailor who wants so badly to take care of him.

And, of course, the sailor, in barracks, is a lone man among other men, who talk continuously about women and sex—but never really communicate.

It's all brought home when Baggs runs into his old commanding officer Forshay (Eli Wallach).

Baggs' long-standing grudge against Forshay dissipates when he realizes what a lonely old man Forshay is. Forshay is glad to see a familiar face. He's about to be discharged—because he was too hard on one recruit who had influence. He has nowhere to go, no family, no wife or kids. No friends outside of the navy, and very few within. But it's the only home he has. And Baggs can only feel sympathy for this man, a good deal older and much lonelier than he.

I haven't told much of the plot—but because entertainment movies are all plot and I wouldn't want to ruin it for you.

The photography is good. The acting is tremendous—especially Kirk Calloway. The screenplay is well-paced and moving. I doubt if it will ever win many awards.

But next time you feel down, or if it's raining or if the winter blues have hit hard, Cinderella Liberty is a fine film to see. It makes you feel good.

Blitzkrieg winner in historical theatre trio

Three Canadian Plays: Michael Cook's Colour the Flesh, the Colour of Dust, Carol Bolt's Red Emma and Bryon Wade's Blitzkrieg, all currently playing at Toronto theatres.

They are a unique combination in that each uses history to formulate the play, then colors the reality by the imposition of a particular myth and interpretative style. Set in a rotting English garrison in the small St. John's, Newfoundland, fishing community of 1762, Colour the Flesh deals with the myth of patriotism and military colonialism and attempts to re-create the people forgotten by history, those who are the colour of dust, the damned left behind when the new world was built. These are the townspeople and fishermen, the original Newfoundlanders, whose past merges into the present. They are the ones moulded by the elemental forces of wind and sea, shaped by survival, blurred by fog, the stink of fish and excrement, their lives a metaphor for the unchanging, the enduring; a people without a mythology except that of themselves.

Red Emma, leaping back to New York of 1890, glorifies the myth of freedom fighters, "the people and the things they can wish for, the beautiful, radiant things." It focuses on Red Emma, one of a group of Russian emigrants, who becomes the 'Queen' of the anarchists and helps mobilize the workers' struggle against the forces of capitalist exploitation, represented by Henry Clay Frick.

Blitzkrieg, the most successful of the three plays, de-mythologizes the history figure of Hitler and, working with the mythology of movies and the cult of filmdom, forms an image of Hitler and Eva Braun as histrionic 'super stars'.

Colour the Flesh, as presented on the opened-up stage of the St. Lawrence Centre, is essentially a disaster. Visually the centre of interest is dissipated by a compressed, multi-levelled set, in which barrels and bar-room, gallows post and boardwalk, garrison and village merge in one fuzzy, claustrophobic definition, ranged against a wide, empty expanse of useless back-stage space. Stylistically the play fluctuates between collective group expressionism — a representation of sea sounds, choral songs, and free-form movement which sometimes leaves the actors draped around the stage as silent presences — and stoic naturalism, including a carefully detailed hanging and a meticulous raising of first the French flag and then the English, made to wave in the breeze of a noisy, electric fan. Added to this is an omniscient narrator, one of the oppressed fishing folk, who steps out of the action in a vaguely Brechtian technique to deliver admonitions to the audience about a silent minority trampled by time, and then rather tenuously returns to his actor's role. Considering director Keith Turnball's recent success with the ensemble collage work of Sticks and Stones, it is all the more surprising that the viewpoint of this play is not only disparate, but also disappears.

The mannered acting evokes a confused mixture of human realism and character as type. The soldiers, cut off from home and country for twenty years who discover that professional and personal values are as eroded as the fabric of their uniforms, are sometimes real but are more often representative symbols of historical event, of the ignoble grandeur of military colonialism and of a mission without a cause or an effect. And Marie, whose story of two lovers and two dead men carries the play, is both an earthy village girl and a dark symbol of misery and continuity. The play makes uneasy transitions between history and myth and leaves the people, whose story it is trying to tell, as lost souls from an age that doesn't matter.

Toronto Free Theatre's Red Emma, under the direction of Martin Kinch, sustains its myth but also loses its people. They become mouthpieces for revolutionary propaganda and the play breaks down into clichés: passionate, young Emma Goldman who stares with glazed eyes into the future, the stolid Leninist figure of Johann Most, scars blazing, who is the intellectual foundation of Anarchists in America, the doubtful duo of Pinkerton men, one-dimensional, two-steppers with clubs in hand and the type character of Henry Clay Frick as capitalist oppressor and operatic dictator.

The attempt to impose a living reality upon these people fails, except occasionally in scenes between the two women, Helen Minkin (played by Diane d'Aquila) and Emma (Chapelle Jaffe). It is as hard to accept Emma, the revolutionary figure, as it is to follow Emma, the hot-blooded adventurous, though her various love affairs — none of which really seem to happen. Helen Minkin, in a more subtle and honest performance, usurps her as the more interesting character. The social realism also suffers from the interruptions of trivial, poorly-executed choreography and some doubtful transitions between song and dialogue, although the music is interesting, effective and a potentially integrative device.

Certain features of the production, however, merit special attention. The theatrical space is well-used, especially in scenes suggesting speaker and audience in a large auditorium where a real sense of interactive tension is developed. The brown-tinted slides topping the set add an important time dimension to the play and inter-lock visually with the action. The set itself, stark, constructivist and workman-like, with two large wheel cogs as a back-up image, gives solidity to the play's form and is a good vehicle for the stage movement. Keyed in black and red, it becomes a dramatic and simplified political statement for the romantic mythology of the downtrodden but free-spirited workers moving towards a new society devoid of the decadent bourgeoisie.

Bryon Wade's Blitzkrieg (now at the Poor Alex under the direction of Eric Steiner) is a fascinating reduction and blow-up exposure of Hitler, seen in relationship to Eva Braun. Instead of attempting to depict a man as large and complex as the myth which surrounds him, the play isolates specific aspects of a personality — an impenetrable stare, meticulous mannerisms, a ranting voice, a cockroach character, hard-backed and thin-veined — and coats them with the lacquer of supreme role-playing.

Set against the cold sterility of Hitler is the lush intensity of Eva, exchanging passion for petulance as easily as she plays games of victim and victimizer. Together the two characters live, create and accept images of their own making — images which become as real or as artificial as those in Eva's favourite film Grand Hotel.

The five, tightly-wound scenes of the play are held together by a quick half-light, FLASH, full-light exposure device which gives us a still photographic representation of each episode just before it moves into life. The play builds action as performance, situation as scenario, history as movie until the final sequence when Eva sits framed by a blank screen in the cold thrust of a projection light.

The closely contained atmosphere of the white set allows emotions and tensions to expand and fill the space to overflowing. They are defined by colour and texture; the redness of Eva, the grey-brown of Hitler, the long, dark, insidiousness of Bormann and briefly, the glitter laughter of Gretl. The room becomes playpen, cell and finally coffin.

The cast, Brenda Donohue as Eva, George Dawson as Hitler, Fiona Reid as Gretl and Don MacQuarrie as Bormann are strong and sure. The play lapses only when it slips from stylization into an impossible attempt at more naturalistic poses. Hitler's confessional nightmare about rats in the trenches and Bormann's relaxation of evil in the party segment do not seem congruent to the rigid, right-angles of these characterizations. They are beyond humanization and can only be accepted, as the play maintains, by the distancing of the movie technique, the safety of a screen which assures us of a final THE END. But the play, without attempting an interpretation of the unknowable, creates definitions of the possible.

Romping through the forest of arpeggios

Beethoven, Sonatas #8,14,23
Radu Lupu, piano
London CS 8806

Every pro pianist worth his ivories knows the significance of the 8/14/23 combination. What is it — a date? a fingering pattern? a pay scale for performances? No, it's the numbering of the three most famous Beethoven piano sonatas, the ones most folks can hum the theme to if given a moment to think about. When a young pianist decides to add these near-obligatory works to his recorded repertoire, he's going up against every heavy the keyboard world has to offer, because there isn't a great pianist worth mentioning who hasn't recorded these works at least once.

By all means, this is perhaps the best combination of pieces for a beginner to either Beethoven, piano, classical music, or any combination of the three to start with. Actually, a new recording of these warhorses poses no problem for the reviewer; the music is beyond criticism, so all we lucky evaluators have to do is sit back and heartlessly cut up the unfortunate souls who come within firing range of our pens.

Radu Lupu is no mean player — as a matter of fact, we had ample proof of that last year when he appeared with the TSO in a line performance of the Schumann concerto. As well, with two previous recordings on London to his credit, he's well established as a performer in the world of vinyl, even if he's not a household word yet. His style comes as a surprise after hearing the strong Schumann last year. The Moonlight sonata comes across in the most subdued and thoughtful performance since Kempff's rendition of some years ago. His tempo is a shade slower than we've become used to hearing in the past while, but he makes the most of the extra time and performance, stretching out the languid melody of the first movement almost to the breaking point.

The last movement, that romp through a forest of left-hand arpeggios and right-hand figurations, is handled with great skill, but doesn't come off with the same beauty that the first movement does, basically due to his taking it in a similarly languid manner, although by no means slow.

The Waldstein and Pathétique sonatas, both mainstays of the piano repertoire are given interpretations in much the same vein — great attention to the slow passages and honest effort made at the fast ones. It's not that he doesn't have the technique to handle the more demanding passages — as a matter of fact, he's spectacularly dead-on and precise — but he hasn't managed to integrate those sections with the manner in which he takes the slow ones.

Despite these minor points, Lupu has made a recording well worth having. Of course, it doesn't replace the great performances of Arrau, Kempff or Schnabel, but in the case of such towering masterpieces, there's always plenty of room for a musician who has something to say. Highly recommended for classical newcomers — in this or any other recording. Hi-fi buffs will appreciate the smooth sonics, which don't get in the way of Lupu's thoughtful playing. A nice touch from London, too in the liner notes: they've taken off the back cover (printed in English and French for distribution in Quebec. Other record companies owned by American parent corporations could take a leaf from London's book and make this gesture towards admitting that they have at least some responsibilities to the Canadian public on both sides of the Ottawa valley.

At least bilingual liner notes are better than nothing; when will we see recordings of the best Canadian artists, though. Recordings of our best musicians belong in the international catalogue of companies like Columbia, EMI (Angel/Capitol), Polydor (DGG) and others. While Radu Lupu is a fine artist, the record buyer should have access to good artists like our Anton Kuerti, Paul Brodie, Judy Loman and others. There. Nationalism sermon ended, go and enjoy this record.

Immigrant Adventures beat TV garbage

Theatre Passe-Muraille has been booted from its quarters to make way for Eaton's gift to Toronto's skyline, but it hasn't stopped acting — this time with The Adventures of An Immigrant, a play about new Canadians.

This latest collaboration between director Paul Thompson and writer Rick Salton features two dozen thematically-connected skits in a loose review format. An unusual effort has been made to take the play to the ethnic community by using a spoken introduction in Italian for each skit.

Throughout the first act the cast successfully portray the mingled humor and pathos that inevitably accompany the immigrants' adjustment to a strange land. The skits are simple and direct in their language and plot, relying upon the universality of everyday occurrences for their appeal. For example, the language barrier is illuminated in the everyday terms of an immigrant searching for a job, and then suffering through his first trip on the subway trying to find where he actually is supposed to work.

The second act opens in the same vein, but gradually politicizes the audience's perspective. The skits centre around a class-consciousness argument that the immigrant is exploited not by any person or institution, but by the social structure itself.

This class struggle theme starts badly with the only weak part of the play, a tasteless and unfunny piece on Johnny Lombardi, but redeems itself by a humorous working of several aspects of the minimum wage and sweatshop labor issue. Class-consciousness and unification of purpose is seen as the solution by Salton.

The cast of Janet Amos, Anne Anglin, David Gray, Richard Farrell, and Eric Peterson plays the wide variety of roles competently but not brilliantly. The simple nature of the skits leads to the use of stereotypes, which they sometimes treat too facetiously. Where they do perform well is in the effort put into speech rhythms and accents. They spent several weeks talking to Italian immigrants to achieve the right tone, and have succeeded admirably, at least to Anglo ears. They further reduce their dependence on actual English words with extensive use of pantomime, which they manage without either seeming contrived or insulting one's intelligence.

The Adventures of An Immigrant is good theatre because it makes you laugh and cry, and eventually understand some of the problems and emotions it represents. While it lacks the literary merit to immortalize it, it is funnier and more imaginative than the garbage that passes for humor on television. Passe-Muraille is rather vague about how long it will run, but it might finish this weekend. Location changes, so call them at 961-3303.

Bonus: reviews of Bonnie and Clyde Winning the Oscar

H. L. Mencken said that no-one ever went broke underestimating the intelligence of the American people, and nothing drives that home like the Oscars. I can think of no other institution that debauches itself so thoroughly each time out and yet still leaves room for further embarrassment the following season. Can you imagine a year in which The Exorcist or The Sting or A Touch of Class or American Graffiti was the best picture? Can you understand the collective sensibility that prefers these films to The New Land, Last Tango in Paris, O Lucky Man!, The Long Goodbye, Mean Streets, Day for Night, Between Friends, Under Milkwood, La Bonne Année, or The Last Detail? Not that all the titles in the latter list are first-prize material — they are just not trash, which The Exorcist, The Sting, A Touch of Class and, yes, American Graffiti are. (American Graffiti is hip trash. In a year or two, when the flush of nostalgia has passed, it will be plain trash.)

The fifth film Hollywood nominated for best picture is Ingmar Bergman's Cries and Whispers, which is like Playboy running Alexander Solzhenitsyn for Man of the Year against Joe Namath, John Dean, Robert Redford and John Milius. I doubt that many Academy members could choose The Exorcist or The Sting over Bergman's masterpiece and still look at themselves in the mirror, but then I imagine many of them have given up mirrors long ago after far bigger sell-outs. Better they should abandon all vestiges of discrimination and come right out and soil themselves publicly once again. After The French Connection in 1973 (it beat The Emigrants), what better recipient for the depreciated statuette than The Exorcist?

The four chosen American films are not equally awful. A Touch of Class cuts its trash with some droll lines and a worthy performance by Glenda Jackson. American Graffiti has Wexler's grainy photography which gives it a look of art. (It also covers up the movie's being as empty of understanding about adolescence in 1962 as Father Knows Best or Leave it to Beaver.) It's an aside, but I suspect the pandering that made Graffiti so trashy is also what made it a hit. Laughing publicly and uproariously at the old days is an easy alternative to coming to terms with one's old, clumsy self. American Graffiti acts as a repression aid, like Playboy Party jokes.)

What the big four movies have in common is the money they are making and that is where the rub is. Not that the public is sold garbage, but that it buys it up so avidly. Down at the nitty-gritty, it is the public's problem, not the purveyors'. There is a kind of odd justice operating among the movie-makers: a good film-artist can earn his living, though he won't get rich — but then by what right should he get rich? Meanwhile the Blatys and Friedkins seem to be finding little enough comfort in their wealth or they wouldn't be calling Paulene Kael all those names on television. When Kael wrote her New Yorker review of The Exorcist, she hit its authors below the belt. Hers was the judgement that would clearly be handed down after the line-ups ceased. She stung their virility, for which box-office receipts are no protection or salve.

The public, of course, is on Blatty and Friedkin's side: the man who rustled his shopping bag all through Last Tango in Paris said he wished he had gone to Magnum Force in the adjoining theatre; the woman in line for The Sting said she had liked The Exorcist, if like was the word, and didn't think it was as gory as Dirty Harry, Magnum Force or The Godfather. It is no good to say that they (and we) are manipulated into the big movies by every trick the promoters can afford. We are, but the studio heads are right, the people like what they see. Lincoln was cagy when he said you can't fool all of the people all of the time. He knew damn well you can fool enough of the people enough of the time.

The Oscars are essentially an election. Foolish, corrupt, cynical pictures win the same way foolish, corrupt, cynical politicians are returned year after year. From the beginnings the movies have been a pop medium. It is the Bergmans and Bertoluccis who are odd-men-out. Cries and Whispers and Last Tango in Paris are true art, true film, but not true movies. The truly good movies are Fiddler on the Roof, Souther and maybe Cabaret.

Last Detail: a movie that swings 'close

THE NICE THING ABOUT both La Bonne Année at the International Cinema and The Last Detail at the York is that they may wind up popular as well as good. Lelouch's film is drier: it's longish and peppered with the sort of dialogue you have to work at a bit to understand. But then it is also a romance, and one not really all that different from Lelouch's big hit, A Man And A Woman. The courting mechanisms are more sophisticated in La Bonne Année (and therefore more engaging if you have surfeited on lyricism) but the end is the same. It is also a big heist picture, and one of the all-time best because you are given enough information to take your thrills from the plot of the crime and not the plot of the movie (The Sting irritated me incredibly because it did the opposite. Again and again, the picture, and not the confidence game it was about, fired off surprises that only worked

anne Annee; Last Detail

Oscar elections

to the maudlin but pulls back in time.

because the audience had been fed misleading information. It reminded me of a magician lifting a rabbit out of a hat and then saying, "By the way, before the trick, the hat was empty." The makers of The Sting are far better comers than Newman and Redford: their marks applaud and recommend the game to their friends.)

On top of its intelligence and fun, La Bonne Année also boasts three strong, affecting performances. Charles Gerrard and Françoise Fabian are fine, and Lino Ventura creates perhaps the most convincing romantic leading man ever on the screen. While playing a classic male role he gives the image the same sort of physical kick that Mick Jagger did.

Jack Nicholson is no slouch either as the macho, posturing navy lifer in The Last Detail, but while it is a tour-de-force performance, onenever loses the Nicholson in "Badass" Buddusky. Like Dustin Hoffman, Jack Nicholson's image is so clear and continuous from one picture to the next that he is as much a star as an actor, even when he gives a cracker-jack performance. Randy Quaid, nominated for an Oscar along with Nicholson, is pretty good as the babyish kleptomaniac Buddusky is charged with taking to military prison, and Otis Young, while given less to do, provides a solid and believable foil as Buddusky's fellow escort.

As with La Bonne Année, the direction and the script for The Last Detail match the performances. The picture bounces along from nice touch to nice touch and misses even the most threatening pit-falls. It is packed with memorable bits and moments: Nicholson's tremendously pointless anecdote about a one-eyed whore with a particularly gross specialty; the inevitable sailor's whore (Carol Kane) musing that while not great, her body is pretty good; Otis Young's frustrated political argument with a pretty zen student, cut off by the girl's heart-felt closure, "Oh, wow". The Last Detail swings perilously close to the maudlin but just about every time it pulls itself back and lands on a lovely, off-centre realistic line or nuance.

The trouble is that the whole basic situation is maudlin. The big, soppy kid is being jailed for eight years for a petty crime that just happened to hit his commanding officer on a particular sore spot. The injustice and bad luck are automatic tear-jerkers. There is a point, I suppose, and I'm sure it happens all the time, that as Buddusky put it, they "stick it in and break it off", but as given it is a cheap shot it is an unearned ticket to our concern, and it's totally unnecessary since director Ashby and company can win us over the hard way. I presume it was felt that this push-button pathos was necessary for a mass audience. Maybe it's a fair price: The Last Detail is up for some Oscars, while the slightly more demanding La Bonne Année is out in the cold.

BOTH LA BONNE ANNEE and The Last Detail are traditional man's pictures, although they are so beguiling in their particulars that one is apt to forget. (Clyde Gilmore said that La Bonne Année crossed the perfect crime genre with women's lib, where in fact, Lelouch's heroine drops everything for her man as surely as June Allison used to.) In The Last Detail the kid finds his manhood through beer, back-slapping camaraderie, and putting it to the whore acceptably enough. That didn't trouble me, in part because the film didn't proselytize about it, and in part because that is a good a form of therapy for the boy involved as most any other. But I wonder if it puts some women off. It won't in a few years, but now it may be salt on a wound.

James Gang newie OK but not a grabber

There's a lot of history behind the James Gang. They were recently joined by Don Troiano, considered by many to be Canada's top rock guitarist, bringing along with him singer Roy Kenner, both members of the ill-fated group called "Bush". Meanwhile, former James Gang lead guitar Joe Walsh split to form his own group. Now Troiano too has left, hoping for greener pastures.

Actually, Troiano's move was a stroke of luck for the James Gang because Tommy Bolin who replaces him, is a much better musician, and is co-composer of all the songs on the album.

As for the band itself, singer Roy Kenner is one of its major problems. One disastrous a cappella section on "Rather Be Alone With You" is a case in point. His voice is technically good, and has a pleasant timbre, but lacks real conviction. This symbolizes the band as a whole: it's competent but doesn't really grab you. The song "Mystery" at the close of the record comes close to creating some atmosphere, but never builds any interesting tension.

There is however one exception: "Alexis". It has an intriguing structure - a very comfortable, very successful soft-rock beginning, finished off with a hypnotic coda which starts about half-way through and highlights an incredible solo by Tommy Bolin which made me think for a second that Hendrix had been reincarnated. It's such a dynamic solo that you can't help wondering why so much of the guitar work on the rest of the album is so uninspired.

But if you're the sort of person who considers an album worthwhile even for just one outstanding cut, here's a record for you.

Straight talk music and rice pudding

My Maria
B.W. Stevenson

Do you like Doug Kershaw, or the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band? Do you like music that is pleasing, but not too complex? Do you like lyrics that tell a straight story and don't get all involved in Heavy Messages? Yes? Then go buy B.W. Stevenson's new album, My Maria.

Both the title song and the first cut on the B side, "Shambala", ought to be familiar to you by now if you ever listen to anything but CHUM-FM. And the other songs are even better. My favorite is a re-recording of last summer's hit "A Good Love Is Like A Good Song". Stevenson's voice is far more interesting and pleasing, and Larry Muhoberac's arrangement is infinitely superior to the one which was so popular.

And so - on to the songs. And they pose a difficult problem to the reviewer. If you possessed the Heavy Messages that I have already told you aren't there, I could quote large passages and thereby fill up this review with Meaning. Even the most quotable ("Dreams don't come 'round on the wheel of fortune much. And they don't come 'round at all unless you got that lucky touch," from "Lucky Touch" by B.W.S. himself.) just don't make it on paper. They give but scant feeling of the down-and-outness that Stevenson's voice and guitar put across. And the words to "I Got To Boogie" are nothing without the boogie behind them that makes you boogie.

If country (whether it be pure as a mountain spring or fiendishly adulterated by use of electricity) is the music you like, you will certainly like this record. If, on the other hand, you don't like country music, don't buy My Maria - but I warn you, you are denying yourself - well - not one of life's greatest pleasures, but one of life's small spots of relief.

Chad Allen
Sequel

My initial reaction - and my current reaction - to this particular chunk of vinyl is that an album so bland, so colourless, so eminently forgettable has seldom come my way. I know it's forgettable because, despite the undeniable fact that I've listened to it numerous times (I've had the thing for some two months), I can't remember it at all. I pause to peer hopefully at the jacket: "Stone Boats", what was that? Or "Dunrobin's Gone". Not a glimmer of recognition. Alas.

The reason for this is, oddly enough, the utter lack of character of the tracks. The lyrics fail to convey any clear cut message or identifiable sentiment; the melodies have a muddlesome similitude; the arrangements are grey. I mean, it's almost irritating, at least when you're trying desperately, as I am, to think of something to say about it in a review. None of the tracks is even striking enough to be labelled "bad".

So I can't leap up and down and say things like, "This is the foulest recording it's ever been my misfortune to hear." The album doesn't merit such derision. It isn't that gutsy. It's just nice and dull, kind of like a well-meaning old aunt.

And, for that reason, I have to advise against buying the thing, which is vaguely sad, because Chad Allen does have a pleasant voice, and the songs are pleasant enough. In fact, the whole thing is so damn pleasant, you can't wait for it to end. It's not a paradox. It's like eating, uh, rice pudding: once or twice is fine, but not every night.

New Chamber Orchestra revives neglected top-notchers elegant sound and faultless intonation from the players to come off; in an ensemble of only eleven players, any notes that are off key, even slightly, will ring through the overall sound, making the listener feel that something's "not right". This problem cropped up once or twice in the performance, but not enough to mar the overall worth. Conductor Armenian handled the music well, leading the group from the keyboard of the harpsichord.

Quite a different note was struck with Oscar Morawetz's "Divertimento for Strings", written 27 years ago as a CBC commission. This music, with its driving slavic rhythms and lyrical middle section was a fine vehicle for showing the orchestra's versatility.

Judy Loman, probably the finest harp player in Canada, appeared as soloist in the next two works, Debussy's Danse, Sacree et Profane and Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp and strings with the aid of flute and clarinet. As I said above, we don't hear the harp too often, especially in a chamber music context, but what a breathtaking addition it makes to the concert repertoire! There's no doubt that Loman is the country's best, but many a top-notch artist lacks the warmth and rapport with the audience that this musician radiates. The Ravel, with its long cadenza-like solo passage in the middle held the audience spellbound, with even the ever-present coughers holding off.

Finishing off the evening was a spirited performance of Bartok's Divertimento for Strings, a work which is not unlike Morawetz's of the same title. The outer two movements are fast-paced and demanding, seemingly reflecting the anguished period they were written in, just two weeks prior to the start of World War II. The middle section, a slow, painful lament emphasizes this air of suffering even more.

Considering the wide range of the music in the concert, from Handel's concerto through the dream-like sonorities of the Ravel and Debussy and finishing with the hard, brilliant edge of the Morawetz and Bartok works, the NCO gave a stunning display of their versatility as a performing ensemble. It could be argued that concentration on just one type of music (an all-Bach or Handel program, for instance) would give the group the last bit of an edge needed to make their sound perfect. And it's probably quite true that by playing such widely divergent pieces they had to compromise somewhere, if only in rehearsal time. But on the whole, each piece was ably presented, allowing us to hear the city's finest chamber ensemble show their prowess in what could be the last concert of the year.

The management of the group handed out letters with the program stating the present condition of the orchestra's finances: ghastly. New grants are scheduled to start in April, but now the concerts are supported on donations. If you can't donate to help keep this fine group alive, then come on out to the next concert on Sunday March 24, when concertmaster Gerard Kantarian will be the evening's featured soloist. Performances as interesting and enjoyable as the NCO have given this year are few and far between, and it would be a great loss if they had to end now.

dave basekin

Despite the familiarity most people have with the sound and appearance of the harp, it makes surprisingly few appearances in concert. In view of the extensive solo and concerto repertoire it possesses, there is no reason why we shouldn't hear it more often. On the other hand, there's also no reason why Handel's concerti grossi should be so infrequently played, but there you are. It's the function of groups like the New Chamber Orchestra to bring these neglected aspects of great music before the public.

Last Saturday's concert in Hart House's Great Hall was (as usual) sold out to the walls, with some of the audience sitting on the radiators. Guest Conductor Rafi Armenian led the orchestra in the opening work, Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 in B Minor. The concerto (for two violins, cello and strings) demands a lush,

Beatle sound-alikes moving into neverland of hard rock

Ass Badfinger
Capitol

The fourth album from the Beatle sound-alike British group Badfinger finds them moving in a new direction. Their earlier pressings, particularly Straight Up, on which production chores were apportioned between Todd Rundgren and George Harrison had an overall sound unlike the harder directions of their latest, Ass. With the exception of "Apple Of My Eye", which in tonality is much like their former hit "Day After Day", and "Icicles" with its complicated phasing on the guitar solo, the ten compositions on Ass move away from intricate voicings into a hard rock area Badfinger should leave to groups like Edgar Winter's band "Quite Trash".

Not that Pete Ham and Badfinger can't wrap themselves around some unadulterated hard rock (witness the tune "Constitution") but their forte remains the slow rockers like "When I Say" with the harmonies that are so charged with Beatlemania—that subtle blend of Everly Brothers voicings with a Chuck Berry supercharged guitar line. Recorded at London's Apple, Olympic and Morgan studios, Badfinger's album features eight songs produced by the group plus a couple of holdover tunes which were part of the Rundgren-produced session for their previous album.

Hart House Sunday Evening Concerts; harmonies du soir

We have an interval, and then our place knows us no more. Some spend this interval in listlessness, some in high passions, the wisest, at least among "the children of this world", in art and song. For our one chance lies in expanding that interval, in getting as many pulsations as possible into the given time. Great passions may give us this quickened sense of life, ecstasy and sorrow of live, the various forms of enthusiastic activity, disinterested or otherwise, which come naturally to many of us. Only be sure it is passion — that it does yield to you this fruit of a quickened, multiplied consciousness. Of such wisdom, the poetic passion, the desire of beauty, the love of art for its own sake, has most. For art comes to you proposing frankly to give nothing but the highest quality to your moments as they pass, and simply for those moments' sake.

The Hart House Chorus; March 17, at eight.

The quiet pleasures of birdwatching and moneymaking

Jonathan Livingstone Seagull
Richard Harris, reader
Terry James - conductor
Dunhill

Not satisfied with making a bundle of money from his best selling book, Richard Bach has allowed Dunhill records to pollute the airways with his mindless mediocrity. Bach's style of writing combines the very worst elements of Rod McKuen's vapid drivel and the phony religious sermonics of television's "Kung Fu". And as a book it joins such magnificent examples of great American trash as Love Story and The Valley of the Dolls.

The story, in short, deals with a gull whose interest in flying, as opposed to the normal desire to eat, gets him expelled from the flock. But our feathered rebel has a meaningful cause, the burning desire to transcend the natural and physical limitations of flight. The search eventually leads him to another dimension where he joins other gulls trying to reach nirvana. After mastering the ultimate power, in moving faster than light on thought power alone, Jonathan decides to descend back to earth and becomes a guru for other gulls.

It's third class corn but on the LP it sounds even worse with Richard Harris' pompous reading and the syrupy background music. But the desire to get you an inside look at the true facts about this latest cult leader, resulted in a meeting with another strange gull. A tip from a Queen's Park pigeon sent me down to the waterfront with my camera, cassette recorder and a couple of joints.

It didn't take long to spot the right bird, I mean how many gulls have you seen flying upside down, screeching "Far Out!" above the festering waters of Lake Ontario. In the middle of an uncontrolled dive he managed to snap up the joint I'd tossed him and belly flopped to a landing. After a few tokes he introduced himself as Jefferson "Airplane" Seagull and we began the interview.

Review: I am told that you know a lot about Jonathan Livingstone.

Jeff: Yeah, we grew up in the same flock but, like, I flew with a crazy crowd. We'd fly to L.A. and get stoned on the smog, you know, but I was pretty young.

Review: You're a long way from home.

Jeff: Well, all those oil spills drove me out.

Review: So what was Jonathan like in his youth?

Jeff: Really weird, always alone, chanting mantras and talking to himself.

Review: Did he ever talk about his ideas, to you or anyone else?

Jeff: He was a bit stuck up, you know, but my mother heard that he's gay. You notice that he only hangs out with male gulls, right? And the females are there just to clean the nests.

Review: Who would have guessed?

Jeff: Honest gull. And now that he's known he's opening a chain of gull nests for meditation. You know of course that his followers turn all their possessions over to him.

Review: That's really slick thinking.

Jeff: He's got the best lawyers looking for tax dodges. That's why there's a house in Switzerland for him, and another in the Caribbean. With the money from the movie, and the planned cartoon show, records, posters even a stunt flying group, he can live it up.

Review: The flying guru is swimming in money.

Pause — after another joint I got Jeff to talk about bird life in general.

Review: How do you survive the winter up here?

Jeff: Easy. There's lots of buildings with chimneys around, right, and that's where the starlings hang out. Well I hang around the big stacks. And if you know your way around there's good spots to get high.

Review: I don't get it.

Jeff: You go to Oshawa or Oakville and fly above the exhausts for the paint shops. Others head for Hamilton or Port Credit, but to me that's like going to a meat packing stack.

Oh! I have slipped the surly bonds of earth/ and danced the sky on laughter-silvered wings...

Review: What about food?

Jeff: In summer the ships are really great, but now we live off the fat or the dumps.

Review: How do you get along with Canadian gulls?

Jeff: No trouble, but most of them go inland for winter. I like the ice.

I gave him a joint and watched him looping out towards Port Credit, screeching all the way. And if you have followed this story my only warning is to keep away from Jonathan. So remember, on the road through life little loads, never look up to a gull. He might give you the bird.

Inside Out may bring deserved recognition for John Martyn

British guitarist Martyn has moved from folksinging to a jazz-influenced style

Three years ago, as a lonely late-night disc jockey on Radio Varsity, I was looking through the station's recent acquisitions and came upon Stormbringer, by John and Beverley Martyn. I liked the cover, and there were musicians like Levon Helm, John Simon and Harvey Brooks backing them up, so I put on a song called "John the Baptist":

*I'm John the Baptist
And this is my friend Delilah
And you can bet it's my head she wants*

And not my heart only

Having listened to the rest of Stormbringer and deciding that I liked John (the Baptist) Martyn and his wife Delilah, I was on the lookout for more by them. In all, it appears, there are no less than seven LPs, counting Inside Out, of which only the last three are currently available in Canada.

The difficulty in obtaining some of his best material helps account for what, to me, is still hard to understand — that John Martyn remains relatively unknown.

Coming originally from Glasgow, Martyn played folk clubs in the British Isles, recording two solo LPs for Island, London Conversation and The Tumbler. There follow two albums with Beverley, the second being the fine Road to Ruin. Since then, on Bless the Weather, Solid Air and now Inside Out, Martyn has reverted to being a solo artist.

There has been a gradual progression from the early folk material to a more jazz-influenced sound and experimentation with electronic effects.

Inside Out represents the end-point in this progression so far. "Make No Mistake" borrows a passage from John Coltrane's A Love Supreme, and "Outside In", at over eight minutes the longest single cut, is an extended jazz improvisation. On several songs, electronic effects make for a deliberately abrasive sound, but the overall feeling is highly relaxed. One reason is the acoustic bass of Danny Thompson, formerly of Pentangle, who has played with Martyn before. Another is Martyn's voice, which has grown more and more slurred with time, as he strives to turn his voice into an instrument registering emotion, less through the words sung, than by the way in which they are sung. Tim Buckley is similar in this respect.

An unfortunate result of this change in Martyn's vocal style is a falling-off in the lyrics themselves, from the earlier folk days. (For the first time Island has provided a lyric sheet) But if the lyrics have gone downhill, the music has consistently improved. On Solid Air, the last album, good musical ideas had been badly developed, almost perversely. The title cut, for example, runs on far too long. On Inside Out, the music is fascinating, from the wordless "Beverly" to "So Much in Love With You," a song I caught myself singing in the laundry while waiting for my clothes. "Outside In" is considerably more successful than "Glistening Glyndebourne", another long jam on Bless the Weather.

An interesting experiment is a quick run-through of Billy Hill's old "Glory of Love".

Besides Danny Thompson, other musicians heard include Traffic's Stevie Winwood, Chris Wood and Bobby Keyes.

With the one reservation mentioned — this is excellent.

FULL-TIME UNDERGRADUATES

"FULL-TIME UNDERGRADUATE STUDENT" means all students registered at the University in a programme of full-time study, who are not registered in the School of Graduate Studies. (Students at Scarborough College, for electoral purposes, will be considered full-time if enrolled in four or more courses.)

CONSTITUENCY I - two seats

All students registered in the Faculty of Arts and Science including Erindale College and Scarborough College.

SHIRLEY DEANNE FRENCH - I am a second year student specializing in Political Science. My interests are Canadian politics and women's rights. I am concerned with our university's lack of support for experimental programs such as those offered at Innis College. The Governing Council has supported regressive ideas like the Discipline Code and rejected beneficial programs like campus daycare. With your help I want to bring about a liberalization of policies which will improve all aspects of university life.

(JOHN) PETER JARRETT - I want to emphasize the importance of the fluidity of communication and understanding between students and their elected representatives. Too many candidates, once elected, become professional student politicians neglecting those they represent. I have a varied background on campus - this year I have been deeply involved with the birth of the French Union and the struggle for student positions on staffing committees. This is the major issue facing us at this time. Express your opinion.

HOWARD STEIN - The issue which I fully standby and deem necessary for the creation of an involving and critical university environment include a thorough investigation into racism at the university, the repeal of the discipline code, student parity at all levels to assure quality teaching, university financed daycare, rent controls in and around the university, a parking policy consistent with the city wide plan, and equity for female and non-academic staff. Chairman - Political Economy Course Union (PECU) 1973-74.

CONSTITUENCY II - one seat to be filled in this election

All students registered in the Faculty of Dentistry, Faculty of Food Sciences, Faculty of Medicine, Faculty of Nursing, Faculty of Pharmacy, School of Hygiene, School of Physical and Health Education, Faculty of Education, Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering, Faculty of Architecture, Urban and Regional Planning and Landscape Architecture, Faculty of Forestry, Faculty of Law, Faculty of Music, Faculty of Management Studies, Faculty of Social Work (with the condition that both members elected in Constituency II not be registered in the same faculty or school). NOTE: one of the two seats in Constituency II has been filled by acclamation due to the foregoing condition.

STEPHEN MOSES - 1973-74: SAC vice-president; member Campus as Campus Centre Implementation Committee, City-University Liaison Committee, Hart House Board of Stewards; chairman, National Union of Students' Standing Committee on Financing Post-Secondary Education

The Governing Council must make the university less alienating, both to students and the community. This involves getting significant student representation in all decision-making processes; improving the university's physical environment; being responsive to community needs; and communicating effectively with all parties about university activities.

TERRY RUDDY - My primary concern is with the Administrations condescending attitude towards its student "colleagues". We are not a "third estate"; we are the "raison d'être" of this university and must be accepted as such. Accordingly, I denounce negotiations concerning the Discipline Code and vigorously support student parity in all decision pertaining to granting of tenure, and hiring and firing of professors. I shall be happy to discuss other matters particularly the University's external policy - 928-3465.

GRADUATE STUDENTS

"GRADUATE STUDENT" means all students registered in the School of Graduate Studies.

CONSTITUENCY I - one seat

All Students in Division I (Humanities) of the School of Graduate Studies; Division II (Social Sciences) of the School of Graduate Studies, with the exception of the Graduate Department of Educational Theory.

KITTY HOFFMAN - A PhD candidate in the English Department in my fourth year at U of T, I have been on the executive of the Graduate English Association and the editorial board of the Graduate English newspaper, 1972-3, and have worked on a research project of the Federal Law Reform Commission. As an undergraduate at McGill University, I served on the Curriculum Committee and the Departmental Assembly of the English Department.

DAISY ELIZABETH PERRY

- B.A., M.A. University of Toronto.
- Teaching Assistant, Dept. of German, Victoria College.
- Teaching Assistant Representative to Combined Department of German.
- President of Association of Graduate Students of German.

PART-TIME UNDERGRADUATES

"PART-TIME UNDERGRADUATE STUDENT" means all students registered at the University in a programme of part-time study who are not registered in the School of Graduate Studies. (Students at Scarborough College, for electoral purposes, will be considered part-time if enrolled in less than 4 courses).

CONSTITUENCY I - two seats
All part-time undergraduate students.

ARLENE DICK - Presently completing a term on Governing Council as Part-Time Undergraduate representative, as Vice-chairman, Internal Affairs (food services, athletics, parking etc.); Member - Academic Affairs (matters relating to courses, etc.); - Sub-committee on (including Working Group on Loan Regulations) - Sub-committee on Methods of selection of students for possible Tenure Committees. Past experience includes: APUS - Vice-president, Editor of VOICE (4 years). I am anxious to continue working on projects already begun affecting part-time undergraduates.

GARY A.J. HEIGHINGTON - Gary Heighington is the VICE-PRESIDENT of the Scarborough College Student Council, Member of the Scarborough College General Policy Committee and Council as Part-Time Student Representative. He welcomes the new college, Woodsworth College, for those part-timers on the St. George Campus. He also wants APUS to remain an association for all Part-Time University of Toronto Students. Gary Heighington on Governing Council will speak with a strong voice for all Part-Timers.

WILLIAM JAMES WHELTON - Have represented my fellow students as an active class representative since 1969, serving also as a director, vice-president and president of your association, as a member of the Erindale College Council and the general Committee of the Faculty of Arts & Science. I have gained useful experience in university affairs and represented my fellow students on many committees. I welcome this opportunity to continue working for the interests of part-time undergraduate students.

TEACHING STAFF

"TEACHING STAFF" means the employees of the University, University College, the constituent colleges, and the federated universities who hold the academic rank of professor, associate professor, assistant professor, full-time lecturer or part-time lecturer unless such part-time lecturer is registered as a student. ("Lecturer" includes associates and clinical teachers in the Faculty of Medicine and associates in the Faculty of Dentistry). In all cases a teaching staff member's constituency will be determined on the basis of his major teaching appointment to a faculty, college or school. Only in the case of a teaching staff member without a teaching appointment to a faculty, college or school will his constituency be determined by another appointment.

CONSTITUENCY IE - one seat

All teaching staff members in the Faculty of Arts and Science who hold their major appointments in the Departments of Astronomy, Chemistry, Computer Science, Geology, Mathematics, Physics, Botany, Zoology (excluding those who hold their major appointments at Scarborough or Erindale Colleges).

JOHN EDWARD DOVE - After rapid expansion, the University now expects a period in which financing will be difficult and in which hard decisions must be made about priorities. It is important that the University have an effective government in which checks and balances are maintained. I have worked to achieve an effective and constructive contribution from the teaching staff in the work of the Governing Council, and I shall continue in this spirit if re-elected.

JIM PRENTICE - I welcome the recent trend towards greater participation of the whole University community in the governance of U of T. I support: a Discipline Code which will be acceptable to students and faculty; a gradual increase in the participation of students in staffing decisions; continual innovation and review to develop more flexible teaching and learning methods recognizing that standards will best be improved by attracting excellent and independent students to this University.

CONSTITUENCY III - one seat to be filled in this election
All teaching staff members in the faculty of Medicine.

MARGARET W. THOMPSON - Graduate of Saskatchewan (B.A. Biology, 1943) and Toronto (Ph.D. Zoology, 1948). On Toronto faculty 1947-48, and since 1963. DAVID O. TINKER - Professor Tinker is a native of Toronto, graduated here in Physiology and Biochemistry in 1961 and did his graduate work in Biochemistry at the University of Washington. He has been a faculty member since 1966, is Undergraduate Secretary in the Department of Biochemistry, and has served on a number of curriculum committees. His research centres on the interactions of membrane lipids and proteins. He is married, has three sons, and is a keen sailor.

ADMINISTRATIVE STAFF

"ADMINISTRATIVE STAFF" means the employees of the University, University College, the constituent colleges and the federated universities who are not members of the teaching staff thereof.

CONSTITUENCY I - one seat to be filled in this election
All members of the administrative staff.

EDWARD E. C. Beaven - Aged 51; born in England, where learned trade as a printer; employed for last seventeen years at the University Press. Served in R.A.F., 1941 to 1946, President of the Universities and Colleges Employees' Credit Union and Director for the past nine years. Keenly interested in labour-management relations and union affairs. Believes that hourly-paid employees, tradesmen, and lower echelon of the administrative staff should also have a voice in the affairs of the University.

KEITH R. BOWLER - Keith has worked from Junior Technician to Coordinator, MSB Central Services. He has headed up the Credit Union, helped to start UTSA, helped to initiate personnel policies, etc.

Determined to make U of T more responsive to staff needs, he has firm ideas for improving salaries, wages, and benefits, from existing resource distribution.

Keith is pledged to communicate REGULARLY with his constituents to seek reactions and advice.

DREW MILLAR - During my four years as a computer programmer at the Library I have twice been a member of union contract negotiating teams and served for one year as a union member of the Library's Management and Union Committee.

All administrative staff employees must ask themselves whether they want to be represented by an employee who is affected by the same working conditions as themselves or by someone whose point of view is basically management oriented!

JOHN H. PARKER - Before his election to Governing Council, John Parker promised to work for unity in the University community and fair representation of staff. He has been active in problems of female staff in promotion and pay, worked for inexpensive parking for those with need, introduced grievance procedures for all colleagues to appeal management decisions thought unfair or erroneous, particularly concerning classification or pay, and proposed appointment of an ombudsman at the University.

Coffeehouses and clubs seem to have settled into a slow period and are concentrating on local talent.

The Riverboat, 134 Yorkville (922-6216), has Dan Hill in tonight through Sunday and the countrified sounds of the Good Brothers can be heard starting on Tuesday. Admission is about $3 or $3.50.

Guitarist-composer Fred Mollin is at Egerton's, Church and Gerrard (868-0036), until tomorrow. Joe Mendelson takes over on Monday. Cover charge is $2.

At Fiddler's Green, behind the Y, on Eglinton east of Yonge (469-3001), Andy Cohen can be heard playing ragtime and blues tonight only. Two singers who perform music from the British Isles, Stu Cameron and Margaret Christal, are featured on Tuesday. Admission is $1.

Bearfoot, the four man band that was once Atkinson, Danko and Ford will be at the El Mocambo, Spadina south of College (961-2558), tonight and tomorrow. The group's still pushing its hit song, Molly, even though Atkinson and Danko have split from the group. Bo Diddley starts on Monday. The cover charge varies.

Concerts are in a stronger position than the clubs, from the look of the upcoming acts.

Rory Gallagher at the Victory, Friday March 8, for 2 shows.

Soft Machine at the Victory, Saturday March 9, for 2 shows.

The Pointer Sisters and trumpeter Hugh Masekela, at Massey Hall, Sunday March 10 at 8:30 pm.

Johnny Winter at Maple Leaf Gardens, Monday March 11.

Roy Buchanan at the Victory, Friday March 15, for 2 shows.

At least one-half of the Firesign Theatre finally made it to Toronto. Peter Bergman and Philip Proctor, both members of that unique, thinking man's comedy experience, appeared at the El Mocambo, on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. Besides being outrageously funny, the duo succeeded in proving the heretofore, unproved lemma: that any subset of Firesign Theatre is still the Firesign Theatre. Long live Papoon.

Yes dear friends, Proctor and Bergman assumed the stage alone, without the aid of electronic gadgets and transformed the room into that special wacky space age media-land that typifies the Firesign spirit. The duo worked their way through a series of improvisations before launching into a tour-de-force presentation of parts of their LP, TV or Not TV. In the space of their one hour tirade, Proctor and Bergman played the parts of some 20 characters, including such notables as Clark Gable, Fred Flamm and Bosco Hearn. And the visual element of the act was attended to as well, with the pair making full use of a suitcase filled with masks, wigs and other props. The punchlines flowed as fast as the beer and the timing was Swiss-movement precise.

Unfortunately, Proctor and Bergman have gone but they did leave word that Firesign Theatre has not broken up. In fact the group's new album titled, The Tale of the Giant Rat of Sumatra, (Columbia), will be released shortly and Firesign expects to come to Toronto in April or May for a Massey Hall performance.

Welcome back, maturing masochists, spawns of camels, curses of a thousand essay attempts! With work closing in on every side, it takes a dedicated music fan to get out to live events. If you can tear yourself away from the musty old volumes, though there's still a lot to see and hear.

Word from the North York Symphony — they're performing the Mozart Requiem with the North York Chorus the Bathurst Heights Secondary School Choir & two North York Teachers' Choir and soloists next Wednesday, 8:30 pm at Convocation Hall, admission $2.50. Culture flourishes in the suburbs, apparently.

At the Edward Johnson Building this week, the student recital series runs into full swing, and no tickets are required for any performances. Today at 1:15 pm, catch flautist Susan MacLennan, or at 5:15 soprano Diane Huestice, or pianist Helena Bowkun at 8:15. The list is really quite enormous, with two or three recitals every day this month. All performances in the Concert Hall.

Sold out tonight: the Beaux Arts trio at Town Hall. Why won't classical promoters promote second shows like pop artists do? Mutter mutter bitch growl gripe whine. One you can catch at the Town Hall is pianist Christa Petrowaka in one of the Young Performers series. Tickets $3.50, $2.50 and the show's at 8:30.

The TSO gets under way on a tour this month, covering England, France and nearly every town with a concert hall in West Germany. Watch the dailies for on-the-spot reporting. If this rag had any class, they'd send me along for the stories, but what can ya do?

Stay away from CBC at ten in the morning. Their once interesting Electric Circus show has drifted far down the mediocrity scale and now boasts the most patronizing, dull announcing in the CBC FM repertoire.

The newly formed Toronto Women's Theatre will stage its first production Good Night Ladies, a recital of three one-act plays, at the Colonnade Theatre. Refuting the assumption that theatre is a male-dominated world, the group of ladies forming the company have chosen to perform plays with women, about women and for people. Cheryl Cashman directs Arrabal's The First Communion, Leonard Cohen's The New Step and Arthur Kopit's Chamber Music — plays which explore females at different times in history and at different points of their development.

Good Night Ladies runs March 4-7.

Daisy Ashford's The Young Visitors, a musical drama for all ages, plays at Stage Two (upstairs at the Firehall Theatre) on March 1, 2 and 3. Fridays and Saturdays at 8:30 and Sundays at 3pm. Oscar Wilde's hilarious comedy The Importance Of Being Earnest, presented by Q Theatre Company, is currently in performance at the Palmerston Library Theatre, 560 Palmerston. Student tickets are $1.50. Call: 789-4841 for reservations. Also in performance is Smelter, an opera for actors, and The Ashes On Gold Avenue. They are being presented by Creation 2 at the Seneca College Studio, 1750 Finch near Woodbine. And The Village Players, a community theatre in Toronto's west end, are presently performing The Bad Seed. Maxwell Anderson's psychological thriller deals with the effects of inherited criminality on an average family. The group are to be found at the High Park YMCA, Dundas and Dupont Streets at Annette. Performances are Fridays and Saturdays at 8:00 pm with tickets at $1.50.

Opening March 6 at the Global Village Theatre is The National Touring Company of Tubstrip, a "biting and bitchy" comedy about the lives of nine homosexuals viewed in a New York City steam bath one night. Bring your own towel!

Rick Salutin's city documentary collage Adventurers of An Immigrant will have a special benefit performance at St. Mary's Church Hall (Bathurst and Adelaide) on Sunday, March 3, at 7:30 pm. Tickets are $2.50 and all proceeds will go to the Artistic Woodworkers' Strike Defence Committee. The play is being performed by Paul Thompson's Theatre Passe Muraille group.

Finally, on campus at Hart House Theatre is Martin Hunter's production of Troilus and Cressida. In this interpretation the play begins in a buoyant spirit that recalls the mood of a college football game. But as the motives and desires of the characters becomes more entangled the colour of the play darkens, until we are confronted with a dirty fight in which no holds are barred... ending in frustration, disappointment and death. The plays runs until March 9, with student tickets at $1.50.

art

The Pollock Gallery on Dundas across the street from the Ontario Art Gallery is having an exhibition of drawings and lithographs by George Grosz. Grosz, like Swift, "master of disgust", is as much as anybody responsible for the images associated with Berlin of the 'teens and twenties. Like Swift, he does not appear to be hot in pursuit of disgusting things to render — eyes bulging, tongue swinging. They (disgusting things) appear to seek him out. His stroke is that of the child and not the pornographer, the judge or the critic. The final illusion — the one that makes his work so potent — is that the subject matter is doing violence to the renderer, and not the renderer to the subject matter. Are you listening Mark Prent?

Alex Katz, one of the big names in pop art, is currently showing at the Marlborough. As with most pop art, Katz' work only had significance as long as it was dismissed by the art establishment and as long as it did not bring him big money. A fart in church no longer has value as a statement after it's been approved and subsidized by the minister and the church elders.

Finally, Colette Whiten, about whom I know nothing but who, judging from her announcement, works in multi-media "environments," is showing at the Scarborough College Art Gallery.

Conway to meet non-academic female staff

By KATHERINE ROWCLIFFE

In an attempt to attract non-academic female staff of U of T to meetings of the newly formed task force studying their status, internal affairs vice president Jill Conway suggested a series of noon-hour meetings at various locations on campus.

She made the suggestion during the second meeting of the task force Tuesday evening at Hart House.

The meetings are open and four observers were present Tuesday.

During a discussion of the nature of information required by the task force, Conway advised them to avoid spending too much time trying to document discrimination.

Sex stereotyping of jobs is inevitable, she explained, and encouraged the task force to suggest possible solutions.

Assistant to the vice provost and secretary of the task force, Gary Wasserman, said later he expected they would make practical suggestions in their report.

Some research of the problem has already been done.

Conway and nutrition technician Gwen Russell sent a confidential questionnaire to the 3,700 non-academic female staff of U of T last spring, but received a poor response to it.

They dealt with the individual cases presented at that time but the task force is concerned with more general solutions.

Erindale professor Gary Thaler, chairman of the task force, said they would welcome written submissions and would respect confidentiality.

He went on to stress the task force did not want to become a grievance committee.

In their September 25 report to the business Affairs Committee, Conway and Russell said:

"Although there appear to be many promotional opportunities open to women, the failure of the university to encourage 'career development' for its staff results in a practical barrier being erected in the path of many women and their desire to move upward within the university."

Career development and job enrichment are two issues the task force will investigate.

Revisions in the first draft of the terms of reference were also discussed Tuesday evening.

Despite assurances from President John Evans to fired part-time instructor Stephen Salaff there are regular procedures for review of that decision, U of T Faculty Association president Bill Nelson has stated there are no formal or regular procedures.

In a letter to ex-mathematics instructor Salaff dated February 8, Nelson says the faculty association disputes Evans' statement made in a letter to Salaff in November claiming the procedure would be similar to review of a tenure decision.

Nelson says "there is nothing procedurally similar to the process of appeal in denial of tenure cases."

He also says UTFA "regards it as important that the university develop a regular procedure in grievance cases arising from the dismissal of part-time people as well as full-time people dismissed before having a tenure hearing."

Evans had told Salaff the regular procedure was that used in appeal of tenure denial cases. This was only after he pressed for more what Evans meant by "normal procedures."

Salaff requested clarification of what Evans meant and refused to enter into a vague grievance procedure.

He pointed out to Evans in the case of a tenure denial the president's favorable decision only leads to the formation of a new tenure committee. This would obviously not apply to part-time staff.

Evans has still not replied to Salaff's January letter. He also requested new evidence be admitted because if Evans is following the tenure denial model, only existing evidence before the request will be permitted.

The popular mathematics professor has constantly had student support as an excellent teacher and his rehiring was one of the unsuccessful demands of last year's math occupation.

Health Liberation attacks medical 'conspiracy'

By ANNE HEALY

Clashing opinions about health care were evident by both panelists and a capacity audience at the panel discussion held in the St. Lawrence Centre Wednesday evening.

Dr. Jerry Green said there is a conspiracy between the professionals, the government and business.

He described these as "self-interest groups which are helping themselves to each other."

According to him: "The prime purpose of the Health Care Service is profit."

The purpose of Health Liberation Collective of which Green is a member is to "work toward basic changes in our social system." Green, again and again, asked for a re-direction in the health services towards "people, not profit."

Health collective member Mary Stern was concerned with two problems: sexism and social class bias in the health services.

She said that the way the present system is set up, low-income people have more difficulty getting help.

Stern also re-stated what Dr. Green had earlier said that doctors rely too much on drugs that cover up the problem rather than solve it.

She concluded by saying: "Not much is actually being done about preventive medicine because it means social change."

J. S. Fralich stated "the difficulty is in communication." He then proceeded to plug his huge drug firm Hoffman-LaRoche.

"The drug industry's one purpose is to improve and promote the health of people (sic)... I leave it to you to decide the contribution of Roche." ...What other drug gives you...?"

He carefully corrected Green's figures on drug companies' spending 29 per cent on advertising and 2 per cent on research. He insisted that Hoffman-LaRoche, while spending only 12 per cent on promotion, spent 15 per cent on research.

Fralich closed by saying the blame for any over-emphasis on drugs must be laid on the doctors—they make the decision whether to use them.

Dr. Bette Stephenson said that "it is not confrontation, but co-operation between the users, the providers, and the funders of health services that we need."

The president of the Canadian Medical Association also stressed the "health care team" is more than physicians, and that "health" is compounded of many things not just health services, but also such things as adequate diet, and exercise, and clean air and water.

Assistant deputy minister of health in Ontario Allen Backley admitted "perhaps we have a sickness care service instead of a health care service." He went on to say that there must be changes, some are being made right now, and many have been made.

He advocated "preventive measures, more out-of-hospital care, and agreed there is an over-emphasis on the doctor. His realistic attitude gained him resounding applause.

Following the panelists' initial remarks was an hour-long question period. One man insisted what we need to improve our health services is political power, namely the NDP party.

One lady shouted out near the end: "We have got nowhere to-night". And, indeed there seemed to be a complete lack of attempts to understanding or communication.

Union for faculty?

HALIFAX (CUP) — The St. Mary's University Faculty Union (SMUFU) and Local 1682 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees have both filed with the Nova Scotia Labor Relations Board to act as sole bargaining agents for the St. Mary's University Faculty Association.

SMUFA affiliated with the Canadian Association of University Teachers, and the CUPE local have both signed up 40 per cent of eligible employees to file with the LRB.

One of the minority recommendations of the U of T's Forster report on academic tenure was the unionization of teaching staff.

Doctors of little use, med student says

By HEATHER SANGUINS

In our society, doctors don't actually do too much, third year McMaster University medical student Donna Cherniak said Wednesday.

She said it is symptomatic they talk a lot, and they think a lot. Nurses do a lot, physiotherapists do a lot, and dieticians do a lot.

But doctors don't do a lot. Cherniak gave as an example an intensive care unit (ICU) where she has worked.

The nurses there run it 24 hours a day. The doctors "float in and float out" but the nurses deal with the minute to minute changes undergone by the patients in the ICU.

She suggested the stringent "time demand" put on doctors is to a great extent "put on by themselves." This is a result of insecurity and an inability on their part to "relate emotionally and politically" to the everyday world.

The result of this total immersion is doctors who are "100 per cent medicine."

However in Cherniak's opinion it also means they "can't be good doctors" and, in a non-medical setting, 100 per centers are "boring" people.

In her final year of medicine, Cherniak said as she had learned "doctor's medicine" she must now go out and learn "people's medicine."

Today the medical field is a "very male domain".

When she was taking her surgical training she was working with another woman who constantly had to assert herself to be taken seriously at the operating table.

This medical student was five feet tall and was constantly being patted on the head and treated in a patronizing manner.

The role of women in the past however was "quite important and quite influential."

In the numerous small villages then women were more often than not the "healers" because people could not afford doctors.

Because of this close proximity to sick people women were actually the "first empiricists" in medicine Cherniak said.

Part of their medical "practices" then included assisting at childbirth. These laywomen were called midwives.

The introduction of forceps as instruments of delivery "knocked midwives out of midwifery" Cherniak said. She pointed out the use of surgical instruments is restricted to professional doctors.

She illustrated this by noting the infant mortality rate in Washington

D.C. immediately after the change went "sky high" because of bungling and infections which had not been occurring when the midwives assisted in delivery.

Today in Britain deliveries are usually accomplished with the help of a midwife. Doctors are only brought in "when they have to be" said the speaker, who studied obstetrics at an English hospital.

Britain has a lower infant mortality rate than does Canada.

On VD and contraception she said doctors were always making "lots of value judgements" on who is doing what with whom.

"Tubal ligation, the tying of the Fallopian tubes, is a much less serious operation for a woman and virtually as effective.

UN university for Toronto

Ward II alderman David Smith yesterday unveiled a proposal for a branch of the forthcoming UN university to be located in Toronto.

The brief proposes an "institute of urban studies" be located in Toronto, with involvement from all three Toronto universities.

The province of Ontario is being asked to find a location for the university, and the federal government is being asked to underwrite the project.

The report states "the Toronto base for the Canadian UN university unit is particularly appropriate because of Toronto's position in terms of the world economy, its post-war growth as a multi-cultural centre, its two major universities and other learning institutions, and its social, organizational and physical attributes as an urban region."

The urban study will involve two parts: the "study of human settlement", and "the management and enhancement of the human environment."

The UN university is conceived in terms of "research, post-graduate training and dissemination of knowledge in furtherance of the purposes and principles of the United Nations charter."

Six units are planned for developed countries, and nine for under-developed countries, with the headquarters being in Japan.

Of T professors participating in the proposal include A.D. Allen, representing the university, and Larry Bourne, of the centre for urban and community studies.

Funny, you don't look like a priest.

Most of the time, we don't.

Our work takes us deep into prisons and neighbourhood bars and wretched homes (both rich and poor). The black cloth might make the people we talk to feel awkward. Life is awkward enough for the con, the suburban boozier, the hooker, the just plain miserable.

Those are our people. We try to help them.

Come help us help others to help themselves. You'll need intelligence, empathy, a tough and gentle spirit. A sense of humour. And to stand on, a rock-like faith in Christ.

Don't be surprised that the Redemptorists don't always look like priests. A fresh wind has blown through the corridors of the Church. The changes are many and all to the good. It's an extraordinary life for the right man Think about it. Then, if you'd like to talk, write or call us.

Vanier: rich must share or violence ahead

By BOB BETTISON

Humanitarian Jean Vanier made a moving plea in front of a crowd of 2,000 Wednesday night to reach out and overcome the barriers separating the rich and comfortable from the suffering and wounded.

He said this could only happen through a love which would not show them how to be like us, but to grow together and allow them to fulfill their own cultural destiny.

Vanier spoke to an overflowing Convocation Hall in a 90 minute address titled "Daring to Love." He is the founder of therapeutic communities for retarded people in France which have been emulated around the world.

Vanier warned peace could only be achieved if the comfortable and the rich shared their wealth. Otherwise there will be increased violence and madness without end.

He called violence a manifestation of an earnest cry for help to test whether there is any love.

"Our only hope is to love to meet our liberator. Men are yearning for God, yearning for peace, that humanity might be one."

He said the rich and the comfortable must be prepared to absorb violence as long as there is suffering and oppression.

He said we must get involved in a struggle for liberating all those who are in bondage and securing freedom for the oppressed.

Vanier illustrated his impassioned plea with stories of the vast amount of suffering endured by people in one of the most overpopulated cities in the world, Calcutta.

He told of the spirit of sharing among the poor and called it truly "beautiful" to see how the "little" people helped each other.

One man in conversation with Vanier had observed the paradox, that Calcutta was also a city of immense tenderness where a poor child might share a piece of bread with a beggar.

Vanier said the important work of the Christian church was "in helping people help themselves." He said in India they were trying to "help people find the interior dignity and creativity" to make a better life.

Confrontation with oppression

Vanier stressed throughout his address the duty of Christians to live in a constant confrontation with the forces of oppression, prejudice, racism and poverty.

In a tone similar to the social gospel movement, he issued a searing indictment on the present prison system in Canada.

Just returned from visiting prisons in western Canada, Vanier lamented the hatred, suffering and wounding of the prison system "especially to our Metis and native brothers."

He added they formed a part of the prison population far out of proportion to their numbers, because of the oppression of the white system.

He recounted a conversation with a western prison official. He said to Vanier Indians were now making strides, becoming "like us."

Vanier replied they would show their "lack of intelligence" if they became "like us." He said they should strive to find their own way, "find their own dignity and self fulfillment."

He was profoundly "disturbed" about the state of the prisons, saying they basically involved a "clash of culture."

Violence is a cry for help from a wounded human being and must be understood as that and not some basic evil, he said.

Vanier then outlined what he called man's highest quest for love, peace, brotherhood and understanding, saying the greatest conflict comes from the shattering reality which makes the dream unrealistic.

"There is no greater anguish than the agony and anguish of a heart that is not at peace," he said. "The structure of society crushes the dream, the reality of economic and political struggles."

He called the inequalities and injustices perpetuated by society the "most terrifying" reality for anyone who is really searching for the dream of love and peace.

Love is dangerous

People are almost unable to love in the face of the barriers they set up to protect themselves. "Love is dangerous. It makes people vulnerable," he said.

The only resolution many people can find is obscuring reality with the illusions of drugs and alcohol or protecting themselves in their comfortable way of life.

Yet mankind is never satisfied. Nothing will satisfy us, riches, joys, possessions and pleasures. We are engaged in a quest for the infinite.

Humans are limited, not only by their inability to attain the quest but by their mortality, the fact any moment their fragile body could cease functioning.

"My flesh is weak. I am faced with the radical reality of my physical poverty... and enclosed by my fears, egoism, darkness and chaos."

But Vanier said people can love each other, become vulnerable and share their inner feelings.

"It is dangerous and if one is rejected the wound is great. There is no deeper hurt."

"When I see wounded people in a sense of depression, our native brothers especially, I see the violence caused by a world of white people."

Vanier said the ultimate form of love is to engage in the fight for freedom, against oppression, ignorance and fear.

"We should not try to assimilate people of other cultures but help them find the strength to listen to their thirst for life and regain their confidence."

Toronto gymnasts place second

By BRYAN ALOCK

The York Yeomen put it all together and were presented with the Caron Trophy for winning the OUAA gymnastics meet Saturday at the Tait McKenzie Building at York University.

York took top honors with 232.10 points. Toronto was second with 211.45. Ottawa third (157.10) and McMaster fourth (118.16).

Toronto's Steve Mitruk won five out of a possible six OUAA gold medals. With 8.8 in the horizontal bar, 8.71 in the vault, 8.7 on the side horse, and 8.6 in the floor exercises and the ring events, Mitruk took first place in the individual classification.

David Hunter of York was second with 47.85. Hans Frick of Toronto placed third with 47.55, taking bronze medals on the horizontal, rings and parallel bars with scores of 8.15, 7.9 and 7.6.

The top seven all-round gymnasts qualified to form the team that will represent Ontario in the CIAU championships. Mitruk and Frick will join York's Hunter, Carisse, McClean, Goertz and Tanner for that meet.

The CIAU competitions have both men and women gymnasts, who will perform at York Friday at 7:00 PM and Saturday at 2:00

ATHLETIC DIRECTORATE ELECTIONS FOR 1974-75 WEDNESDAY, MARCH 13TH, 1974

CLOSING DATE FOR NOMINATIONS — MONDAY, MARCH 11TH, 1974 - 5:00 P.M.

To be eligible for nomination a student must be in the second or higher year, but not in his final year at the University. There will be one ballot only under which 121 members of the electoral body (composition available in the Athletic Office) will vote for one candidate for each of three groups as follows:

- Group "A" Basketball, Football, Hockey
- Group "B" Sports other than those specified in Group "A"
- Group "C" College and Faculty Athletic Associations

The votes will be tallied under group headings and the elected representatives to the Athletic Directorate declared as follows:

- The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "A"
- The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "B"
- The nominee polling the highest number of votes in Group "C"

(The second representative in this group is appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee - see next paragraph)

In addition to the five students elected as set out above, there is one student appointment from The Students' Administrative Council and one student appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee to make a total of seven student representatives upon the Athletic Directorate.

The basic aims of the Athletic Association are set out formally in Article 1 of its constitution reading as follows:

"The Association shall be called the University of Toronto Athletic Association, and its object shall be the encouragement of athletic sport, the promotion of physical education, the provision of recreation for its members and the maintenance of the highest standard of amateur sport".

The Athletic Directorate, as the controlling body for athletics at the University, meets twice a month during the academic year and deals with a wide range of athletic matters upon which decisions are required. A good deal of this business is considered in committee, all committees having student representation.

Students elected to the Athletic Directorate are expected to attend the formal meetings unless there is good reason for absence; also they are expected to take their share of the committee work. A student member may quite properly bring any matter before the Directorate which his constituents wish to have discussed.

Each nominee for election to the Directorate may submit a written policy statement which he is entitled to send to all members of his electoral body. This is the recommendation of the student committee which revised the method of election of student representatives.

Lady Blues lose game they needed

By SANDY BENNETT and DIANE WARDROPE

The Lady Blues lost one game all season, but it was the game they had to win to advance to the finals of the OWIAA ice hockey tournament held at Guelph last weekend.

Although the Blues started the season as the obvious team to beat, the others worked to catch up and at the tournament there was not much to choose from between the four top teams—Toronto, Western, McMaster, and Guelph.

The Blues met Guelph in the semi-final game on Friday. Early in the first period they ran into two consecutive penalties, and with that double advantage, Guelph made it 1-0.

The Blues looked over-anxious through most of the game and as a result, teamwork suffered. Several players fanned on slap shots and on a few occasions, the puck seemed to get lost between Blues' skates.

By the middle of the third period it was 3-0 for Guelph and only in the last few minutes of that period did the Blues get untracked to provide some of the most exciting moments of the tournament.

With four minutes left, Toronto pulled goalie Louise Attalah and successfully got a goal by Lynda Harley. Attalah returned for the face off but came off quickly and Ange Colm made it 3-2 with about a minute left.

Attalah came out again with about 30 seconds left, but time ran out on the Blues. The final score was Guelph 3, Blues 2.

With their enthusiasm depleted by their disappointment,

The Varsity—Betsy Cook

Queen's goalie covers up the puck as two Lady Blues swoop by a defender and look for a rebound.

Toronto then went on to play last place Queen's. The crowd may have expected a 'nothing' game, but coach Ron Brown had other ideas.

Using his defensive squad in forward positions and vice versa, and with Judy Reeves minding the twine, it was going to be an interesting game if nothing else.

The first goal of the game was scored by Jan MacKay, with her forward line of Missouri and Griffen assisting. Queen's managed to tie it up at the end of the period.

Excited about this new arrangement, the Blues played a good game of hockey. Lynda Harley, who played a great defensive position, scored from Goldsmith and Stead to put the Blues ahead 2-1 going into the third period.

The third period was dominated entirely by Toronto. Mary Griffen missed three sure goals while right in front of the Queen's goal crease. Queen's tied the game on a fake shot that had Reeves completely fooled.

But with two minutes left to play, Margi Goldsmith tallied for Toronto from Angie Comb and Val Bush. Queen's goalie played an unbelievable game turning away 30 shots.

Women swimmers and divers finish second

The Varsity women finished only 27 points behind the powerful Waterloo Athenas to place second in the OWIAA swimming and diving championships at the University of Ottawa on February 15 and 16.

Waterloo won the meet with 350 points, followed by the U of T with 323 and Western with 314. Ten universities competed.

Toronto and Waterloo each won six of the 16 events but the Athenas were able to place more competitors in the top positions to pick up important bulk points.

Former Olympic breaststroker Jane Wright, a first year language student, picked up three firsts for the Tarpons, establishing new OWIAA records in each event. Wright won the 200 yard backstroke in 2:15.9, more than ten seconds ahead of Waterloo's May Murray.

Wright swam to a smooth and comfortable victory in the 200 yard IM, with a time of 2:13.4, finishing 15 seconds before Murray touched in. Wright also won the 100 yard back stroke in 1:04.5 scraping seven-tenths off the old mark.

Physical education student Nancy Thomson maintained her early lead to capture the 200 yard breast stroke title in 2:43.2. OWIAA record holder

Pat Kitchen of Western was able to close the three-body length gap during the last 50 yards, but could not overtake Thomson, and finished a half a second behind.

Thomson also won the 400 yard IM in 5:24.1, and placed second after Kitchen in the 100 yard breast stroke.

Freestyler Marilyn McCormack swam a personal best time to finish second in the 100 yard free style in 1:01.2. She joined Shirley Schmidt, Joy Stratton, and Wright to take the 400 yard free style relay event in 4:00.0.

Stratton placed third in both the 200 yard free style and the 100 yard butterfly events, and second in the 400 yard free style. Schmidt finished fourth in both 100 and 200 yard free style races.

Joyce Drokan won consolation finals in both the 100 and 200 yard free style. Rona Posen finished first and second in the 200 and 100 yard consolation backstroke finals.

Breaststroker Nora Dobell, along with McCormack, Thomson and Posen placed fourth in the 400 yard medley relay. IM swimmer Dinny Biggs, breaststroker Janet van der Eyk and butterflyer Cathy Craft added team points in their events.

The first year diving squad made a fine showing in both diving events. York's Kathy Lane captured the one and three meter titles, followed by Janet Sproat of Western and Toronto's Sandra Henry.

Diving with a fractured hand, Kathleen Crosbie finished seventh in both events. Ruth Allen placed eighth in the three-meter and Ann Milburn eleventh in the one meter.

Six U of T women qualified for the nationals to be held this weekend in Sudbury. They are Drohan, McCormack, Schmidt, Stratton, Thomson, and Wright.

Boxing exhibition held

Boxing enthusiasts witnessed a fine display of boxing skills last Wednesday night at Hart House. Although most of the bouts were intramural, this boxing card served as a tune-up for the U of T boxers who will be going down to Buffalo to compete March 5.

The exhibition opened with a 140 pound class bout between Peter Smith, a first year PHE student, and Joe Hajnal of the Ajax Boxing Club. Both fighters sparred cautiously in the first round, but Smith came on in the last two rounds to win a unanimous decision.

This was followed by a catchweight bout between Joe Pitushka of Eng and Danny Doyle. It was a hard-hitting match, with both fighters trading punches, but the unanimous decision went to the more experienced Doyle.

The third bout was an exhibition between Steve Way of PHE and Dave Millar of Trin. Although it was only an exhibition, it also turned out to be an interesting match.

The next bout featured Richard Wright, a graduate student, against Lloyd Roberts in an evenly contested, hardfought battle which ended in a draw.

Then followed a brief intermission of playground bouts with young fighters from the Trinity and John Innes recreation centres, under the direction of Ivan Braithwaite and Mile Allemano respectively.

The action resumed with a catchweight exhibition bout between Tim Smith of Trin and Joe Junkal of Oshawa, in which both boxers displayed their considerable abilities.

In bout six, Thomas DeWolf of Trin posted his first victory in as many fights with a well-earned unanimous decision over Vic Pacione of SMC.

The last bout featured Joe Fadl-Alla, a graduate student, against Mike Allemano, also a U of T grad. Allemano took the unanimous decision after three rounds of furious toe-to-toe slugging.

Other U of T boxers not featured on the card were Tim Barbetta and Gord Hill, both of SMC.

Tracksters do well

By BRAD MORLEY

U of T was well-represented at the 1974 Toronto Star Indoor Games. In the afternoon college section, Western, handily won with 84 points. U of T followed with 59 points, Vanier college of Quebec came third with 39 and Queen's fourth with 33½.

Toronto captured two firsts with Dave Barrett's 13'6" pole vault win and John Sharp's 9:05.1 two mile win over Ron Falk in a last lap battle. Sharp was just recovering from a three week layoff due to an injury.

U of T also got four good second place finishes from Rick Cunningham (1000 yard run), Mike McVarish (high jump), Ron Nastuk (pole vault), and a four man team in the one mile relay. Members of the relay team were Matt Duncan, Dave Howes, Dave Colbert, and Cunningham.

In the evening meet, U of T runners also did well. Joey Sax and Mike Dyon placed second (4:12.1) and eleventh (4:20) respectively behind Bryan Strides (Brock) who set a meet record.

Susan Bradley placed third in the 50 yard hurdles with a time of 6.7 seconds.

The U of T track team of Roger Tremblay, Frank Aguan, Doug Cartan and Gerry Feeney won the Ontario two mile relay in a meet record of 7:46.6.

The relay team of Colbert, Brizh, Feeney and Kingly Hurbs won the Ontario Mile relay in 3:26.0.

Discipline imposed

In the last two meetings of the intramural sports committee, disciplinary action was taken on four separate incidents involving intramural hockey.

Three cases were dealt with at a meeting before reading week. In one case, a student was banned from ever playing hockey again at the university. He allegedly hit another player over the head with his stick.

In two less serious cases, two other players were suspended for two and three games respectively. Both were suspended for altercations involving the referee.

The intramural sports committee met again last Wednesday night to deal with another player who hit a rival over the head with a hockey stick "lumberjack fashion". This offender was also permanently barred from university sports.

The intramural sports committee has 26 members, representing the various colleges and faculties. The committee has no faculty members.

Social work students begin boycott today

Classrooms in the Faculty of Social Work may well be empty today as social work students begin the first day of a two-day boycott of classes in an effort to gain parity on departmental decision making committees.

It is the most dramatic effort of the academic year by students to gain a say over the day-to-day decisions which affect their academic lives.

While the current situation came to a head in recent weeks, the groundwork for today's student strike was laid in previous years.

In January the student union of the faculty voted to remove all students from policy committees because the committees had no actual power to make departmental decisions which were being made behind closed doors by faculty.

Students charged the committees were just so much window dressing. Students also handed over six demands to the faculty which were not met in ensuing negotiations.

A course in "professional values" listed in the demands should become student controlled, the student union said. At present some students find the "values" taught to be too rigid demanding unquestioning acceptance.

Another demand was more flexibility in course content and requirements for a masters degree and more independent study programs. Currently the masters degree program is very carefully structured with little choice in course work.

Other demands include students being able to see their own records, and parity on decision making bodies with no new staff hired until parity is established.

In addition the student union does not want anyone admitted to the 1974-75 class until parity is achieved.

In a release from the student union the students say:

"We firmly believe in our right to become 'equal' partners in our education and in the merit of our demands."

"It has now become obvious that we must demonstrate our dedication to these rights."

The release further says:

"In the opinion of the student union of the Faculty of Social Work, the actual accomplishments of the negotiating process have been at best minimal."

The student union claims the faculty does not want parity, which has been the reason for the breakdown in negotiations a process which first began in January.

"We are clearly facing a situation in which the teaching faculty will oppose students but bow to the edicts of the university administration."

November Greek uprising shown in films at U of T

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Members of Toronto's Greek community responded enthusiastically Saturday to films and speeches on last November's student uprising in Athens presented in the Medical Sciences Auditorium.

The program, sponsored by the Association of Greek Democratic Students, featured a speech by a student involved in the uprising, tapes of the radio programs run by the students during the uprising, and films of uprisings in March and November 1973.

Also featured was a taped interview with the mother of one of the students, originally received by a West German radio station.

"For the Greek students who with their voice and their blood shocked and arose us, we owe gratitude and honour," the voice on the tape said.

"We're crying because when you're asking for the simple truth, for freedom, the armed traitors answer with murder."

"With the students' slogans and feelings we all feel the same enthusiasm."

The Greek student who spoke—he is now legally in Canada—traced in some detail the history of the student movement against the military regime.

He does not wish to be identified by name, for fear of consequences in Greece.

"For five years the students were enclosed in an iron cage of military law," he said.

However, in February 1973, the students in Athens asked for elections to be held in November.

The reaction of the ruling junta was to draft the student leaders, and then to attack the students without warning.

"Many students were arrested, and beaten even in lecture rooms."

This was followed by further student demonstrations, in February and March, and shortly after, the abolition of the monarchy and declaration of a republic.

On November 14, 1973, students occupied the polytechnical institute in Athens, and the next day were supported by other city students.

The Varsity—J.D. Andrew

A Greek student who was involved in last year's student uprising traced the history of resistance to the military regime.

"This is the polytechnic, this is the radio station of the free struggling students, of the free struggling Greeks," declared the student broadcast.

By November 16, 10,000 people had massed by the institute. At midnight, police attacked people in the streets.

At 3 am on the 17th, nine tanks had entered the polytechnic.

"Police shot students (at) point blank range. That Saturday morning I'll never forget," the student said.

Current estimates of the number of student dead, according to organizers of the program, range between 300 and 500 and 100 names have been confirmed.

On November 25, shortly after the uprising, Georgios Papadopoulos was overthrown as premier by the military.

The audience was shown three films from Greece, the first of the February, 1973, uprising, with students on the roofs of buildings

Toronto firemen prevent Robarts book-burning

By MARINA STRAUSS
and LORNE SLOTNICK

Toronto firemen rushed to St. George and Harbord last night as the John P. Robarts library faced possible destruction.

Occupants of the library were forced to abandon their work and flee the building at 8:35 as a false fire alarm was triggered and rang for five minutes.

As users evacuated the building in a spirit of annoyance, disbelief and hesitancy, four fire trucks and a metro police car whizzed to the St. George Street scene only to confront a somnolent mob and no fire.

Lines at the coat-check counter stretched "for miles," said one observer, as bookworms were reluctant to face the bone-chilling 57-degree temperature in nothing but their studying regalia.

A library security guard confirmed afterwards the false alarm came from the library science building. The two adjoining buildings run on the same alarm system.

At 8:40, as the angry and sometime indifferent throng returned to their study posts or left the library in exasperation, weaker alarms were still ringing from doors which were opened during the rush exit.

Doors in the library are hooked to alarm systems to prevent people from sneaking off down the back stairwell with a book.

At press time last night, the engineers on duty were unable to pinpoint what had triggered the alarm.

A copy of "A Guide to the Birds of Patagonia" was rushed to Toronto General Hospital with second degree burns and smoke inhalation.

A hospital spokesman said the back is in satisfactory condition shouting and singing anti-military slogans.

The second film was taken by a Dutch crew, inside the occupied polytechnic.

"Of course it is dangerous," said one student, "but we prefer our freedom."

The film showed tanks smashing down the polytechnic, and the sound of shelling.

Students were shown building bonfires to disperse the effect of tear gas.

The third film was taken shortly after the uprising ended. Cars crushed by tanks, and buses sabotaged, covered with slogans, and used as barricades were shown.

Many of the student leaders were exiled to the barren island of Yura, a traditional home for enemies of the state.

Organizers of the program feel the main result of the uprisings will be a greater courage on the part of Greeks to speak up against the regime.

Canada Metals trying to muzzle health board

Canada Metals has now decided to try to prevent the chairman and two other members of the city board of health and the board itself from dealing with any matters concerning its operations.

If the injunction is granted, the board will be unable to deal with the Canada Metals lead pollution case at all.

The injunction specifies the board be prohibited "from dealing with or disposing of or taking any steps or proceedings pertaining to or doing any act pertaining to or adjudicating on... any matter touching the operations of Canada Metals."

It also provides the board "either jointly or severally lacks the jurisdiction to deal with or dispose of... any matter concerning the operation of the applicants Canada

Metals and Toronto Refiners."

The city board of health is responsible with safeguarding the health of city residents. It has had the power to take significant steps to alleviate health hazards.

Lead levels in the area around the Canada Metals plant have been abnormally high and last week a Canada Metals worker was forced to go into hospital as a result of a level of twice the upper limit set by the province.

Area residents have been trying to close the east-end plant for four years.

The three members of the board specified in the injunction request are Aldermen Anne Johnston and Dan Heap and Dr. David Parkinson. If the injunction is granted they would be unable to sit on the board if the Canada Metals case is discussed.

In what is becoming a landmark censorship case, Canada Metals is pulling out all the stops in trying to prevent its opponents from publicizing its continued slowness in reducing lead emissions from its eastern Avenue plant.

The provincial Air Management Branch (AMB) has notified Canada Metals of its failure to comply with a controversial order it issued to pave a part of the plant and cover battery stock piles to prevent dust blowing out of the area.

The company has installed a new filter plant but this is only part of the order. The AMB is now deciding whether to take the company to court.

A company secretary was unaware on Friday the order had not been complied with. "As far as I know, we have met the deadline," said Stanley Brownlee.

The other injunction, designed to prevent Heap, Johnston and Parkinson from taking part in health board deliberations over the Canada Metals case, is based on "the grounds of bias or a reasonable apprehension or likelihood of bias."

The hearing is to take place this morning at 10:30 at Osogode Hall. The order, if granted, would also prohibit the board from even considering the Canada Metals case until Heap, Parkinson and Johnston are involved.

The injunction was prepared by Toronto law firm Thompson Rogers.

In related developments, at court on Friday the Canada Metals council argued the Globe and Mail ignored the injunction's intent in outlining the content of the radio program "Dying of Lead" in its report by Graham Fraser.

They charged he had described the parts deleted by CBC in the broadcast of the controversial lead pollution documentary.

The argument took place at a contempt of court hearing on charges that James Cooper, publisher of the Globe, Fraser and three CBC employees be jailed for contempt of court.

Globe managing editor Clark Davey submitted an affidavit saying the newspaper believed there was nothing wrong with reporting the contents of a court order. "It may have been naive of us but that's what happened."

Chile trials begin

Fourteen members of the Chile Solidarity Committee (CSC) arrested in a sit-in occupation of immigration department offices last November, come to trial tomorrow, 2 pm, at the Old City Hall, in courtroom number 33.

The trial had been postponed from Feb. for the 14 charged with trespassing in connection with the national protest against the Canadian government's reluctance to grant asylum to political refugees of the Chilean military coup.

Similar sit-ins occurred in Montreal, Winnipeg, and Vancouver that joined in demanding freedom for the juntas political prisoners, citing the cases of Luis Corvalan, head of the Chilean Communist Party, and Luis Vitale, Marxist historian and a leader of the Fourth International. The firing of Canada's ambassador in Santiago, Mr. Ross, was also demanded.

Those in solidarity with the Chilean resistance are encouraged to support the defense of the CSC militants by coming to the trial.

Nine arrested picketing Dominion over grapes

By MARINA STRAUSS

Metro police charged nine people, including three priests, who were picketing Dominion stores Saturday afternoon in the on-going effort to have non-United Farmworkers' (UFW) grapes and lettuce removed from the stores.

The nine picketers at two separate plaza stores were all charged with petty trespassing and were issued summonses to appear in court. The owners of the Yorkdale and Yonge and Eglinton Square plazas laid the charges.

Marshall Ganz, co-ordinator of the grape boycott and UFW spokesman, said yesterday 36 of the 56 Metro Dominion stores picketed by farmworkers supporters Saturday had removed California grapes and lettuce from the stores' shelves.

"But we don't know if they took it off just for the day or if they'll put it back on the shelves Monday," Ganz pointed out.

"In any event, we will keep picketing Dominion Stores that continue to stock the grapes and lettuce we are boycotting," he added.

Seminarians and 83 clergymen were among the 380 workers' supporters picketing stores Saturday handing out leaflets and speaking to passers-by.

Along with the three priests, four theology students, one community worker, and a housewife were charged.

Dominion stores executives refused to meet Wednesday with a delegation of 11 clergymen.

The group had come to ask the stores not to interfere with the workers' supporters efforts to "peacefully inform the public by removing us from malls, shopping plazas and parking lots," Ganz explained.

The clergymen left a letter at the Dominion stores headquarters.

Spokesmen for the stores were unavailable for comment last night.

Although Dominion's managers of the Yorkdale and Yonge and Eglinton stores did not lay the charges, Ganz surmised:

"I'm sure it was at their requests."

Last month Metro police chief Harold Adamson issued a statement to the police commission stipulating off-duty police were no longer permitted to accept employment from Dominion stores for purposes of interfering with boycott pocket lines.

Police were called in on Saturday's incidents, a Metro police spokesman confirmed yesterday.

In the current four-month drive of the boycott, these charges come as the second batch to be laid on picketers.

In January a U of T student was arrested at the King and Dufferin Dominion store by an off-duty Metro policeman hired by Dominion at $8.50 an hour, UFW campus representative Lupe Gambo has reported.

The UFW picketing is an attempt to convince California and Arizona grape and lettuce growers to recognize their union.

UFW workers have been on strike since last April, after the growers' refusal to renew the union's contract, which the UFW had won three years ago.

The grape growers have not yet signed a contract with any union, following the Teamsters Union pullout from farmworker organizing.

Parking proposals have long history

By ANDREW FALUDY

The proposals for changes in U of T parking policy which are to go before Governing Council in the near future originated at the city-university liaison committee last summer.

Internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway told The Varsity that the city made the request through the committee last June.

The proposals were then discussed in the Governing Council's internal affairs committee in October before being passed on to a university parking study group.

The group, composed of representatives nominated by SAC and various other university bodies then made the recommendations which are now being considered.

The original proposals differ from those Governing Council will be considering.

The group's proposals were based on the principle of "severely restricting all day parking."

If the proposals are adopted, U of T parking will become available only to those who need it most.

Top priority is to be given to people who commute over great distances, the handicapped and those who need their cars during the day.

The group has issued a list of parking guidelines which they would like to see implemented.

Currently there are about 2,800 parking spaces available at the U of T.

In effect the group proposed a cut-back of 28 per cent in parking spaces. This is because some 800 spaces will be taken up by the building of the new Athletic complex and Innis college.

The group says "the number of parking spaces presently available for members of the university are adequate (approximately 2,000 after Innis College and the Athletic complex are begun) "and would like to see this number maintained."

U of T parking policy has been under fire recently from Ward 5 alderman Colin Vaughan and Ward 9 alderman Dorothy Thomas who termed it "arrogant."

Among the changes proposed by the study group is the suggestion that the present system of scattered car lots be replaced by centralized parking structures.

The group "wholeheartedly endorsed (the suggestion) on both economic and aesthetic grounds." It was also suggested the present lots be replaced by landscaped areas.

However, this would inevitably result in an increase in parking costs, which would also have to cover the cost of building such structures.

Philip Cohen, a member of the study group said the present parking

"Ge, ma, they look just like ants." This view from high atop the Robarts illustrates how many cars flock to U of T lots were unsightly. Asked if whether he thought the proposed structures would be any better he replied:

"They ought to be underground but the cost would be astronomical."

Cohen defended the increase in parking prices that the implementation of such a policy might bring.

"It's a question of privilege," he said.

"Why should someone working at the U of T be allowed the fringe benefit of cheap parking?"

"The university is a government institution and should be charging government rates."

Any other system, he claimed, "is just not egalitarian."

Cohen also attacked The Varsity for its news coverage of the parking problem.

"The Varsity is misleading in saying that the university is struggling to allow people to park downtown."

"The people at buildings and grounds are most strongly opposed" to the current level of parking.

Chinese rewriting history

By BOB BETTSON

York University professor Jerome Ch'en said Wednesday the new school of Chinese historians is providing new interpretive insights and restoring lost vitality to Chinese history.

Ch'en was speaking to an audience of Chinese and history students about the revisions of history made as a result of the Cultural Revolution in the late Sixties.

Born in China, Ch'en is one of the foremost North American authorities on Mao Tse-tung and is author of a popular book called Mao and the Chinese Revolution.

Ch'en told the audience Mao has sketched a Marxist framework for the re-interpretation of Chinese history since 1820, documenting the successive decline of feudalism and the rise of western imperialist exploitation, culminating in the beginning of an anti-imperialist, anti-feudal movement.

Ch'en called this mass movement, basically spontaneous. It preceded the rise of the Communist party to power after its founding in 1921.

The remarkable rise of the communists to power in the short span of less than 30 years is one of the miracles of modern times but Ch'en concentrated on documenting some of the highlights of the reinterpretation of history since the Cultural Revolution.

The new history is recorded in a set of nine books published last year by a team of Peking academics, anonymously. Based on a massive amount of documentation these works are now considered an important re-interpretation of Chinese history.

According to Ch'en the new history glorifies, highlights and sometimes exaggerates the role of the masses in spontaneous uprisings.

China has a long history of peasant revolts and these are the focus of the new historians.

Ch'en also said the Chinese Marxist scholars were coming to grips for the first time with ancient Chinese philosophy and traditional history.

One of the hardest things is that any interpreter of Chinese history faces a long period from 800 BC and 1900 AD when the system was basically feudal.

The difficulty is that Marxist histories have had nothing good to say about the whole period when the Chinese people obviously made cultural and other contributions to the rich Chinese heritage.

He emphasized, however, the new historians were also getting into new areas of history neglected by traditional Chinese historians. These include classes outside the elite, and looking at personal, village communal and factory experiences; in short, a history of the whole Chinese people rather than just the elite.

There have been contradictions between pre and past cultural Revolution history. He said the new historians were inclined to make omissions or deletions when it suited their purpose.

However they are still emphasizing political, military and individual history instead of exploring cultural and economic history.

Ch'en was educated in China and got his PhD and taught in Britain until 1971 when he came to York university.

3 contest SAC jobs

They're off and running for the presidency of SAC with three slates of candidates vying for the top spots of the SAC power structure.

SAC services commissioner Seymour Kanowitch heads the early-bird slate which filed nomination papers a day before the deadline Friday.

On the Kanowitch ticket are engineering student Tim Buckley and Scarborough's Fred Stewart, looking at the two SAC vice presidencies.

The second slate is headed Peter Bauman running with engineer William Paterson and Scarborough student Laura Conn.

Not to be outdone by those contenders, the Brute Farce Committee came up with their own trio of Michel Chamberland backed up by Carol Bonhoff and James Maclean.

Polls will be open in the middle of next week.

Social work students strike for parity

The student strike today and tomorrow in the Faculty of Social Work has been a long time coming but is a logical progression from events in that faculty during the past two years.

The faculty strike is also a good example of what some students are fighting for at this university—parity on staffing committees and the right to determine course content, structure and marking.

Students have proven on the Innis College Council and the sociology department committee's parity bodies that they are capable of being rational human beings.

The next test in the fight for basic students' rights appears to be the Faculty of Social Work.

Two years ago this month School of Social Work (as it was then known) Director Albert Rose destroyed any student illusions that they were effectively participating in and influencing changes in the school.

Rose issued a memorandum to all students, announcing a status and name change for the school which would turn it into a new Faculty of Social Work at the time of the inauguration of the new Governing Council in July 1972. The memo also informed students the director had developed a new administrative structure in consultation with senior university officials and members of the school. However, students and their elected representatives were never consulted. It is this "administrative structure" which foreshadowed the widespread student discontent now prevalent in the faculty.

Students had not been involved even in a token way in the decisions concerning the jurisdictional boundaries of the three new committees which would comprise the basis for the new administrative structure.

As Director Rose said at the time: "I conceive my mandate from the university to be responsibility to the school and that I have not shared with the student."

Rose knew at the time the school's student council was preparing recommendations urging greater student participation in the running of the school but he didn't bother to consult them before making his decision.

Rob Hart, then editor of the student newsletter said, "We feel we have been deceived, hoodwinked, steamrolled and screwed again. The administration has acted in complete lack of good faith."

Jorden Hall, a student member of a task force dealing with the lack of student participation in decision-making said at the time: "The method by which the decision was handed down was less than open. It did not recognize the input of students during the year, and leaves in question the integrity of the present administration with reference to voluntarily including students in the major discussions about the future of the school."

In announcing his new administrative structure Rose followed the 1967 Haist Rules. He claimed, "Administrative decisions are ones which concern committee structure, budget, staffing, hiring, firing, promotion and tenure."

Rose's administrative structure called for three new committees. The Administrative Policy Committee was to be a parity committee, but only when "the agenda appears appropriate" said Rose. He added: "As we will be concerned with personnel and administration on this committee, most matters won't affect students."

The second committee—on Educational Policy—will hold "traditional faculty meetings to discuss matters concerning teaching and development which again won't affect students."

However, the Curriculum Policy Committee was to be much the same as its predecessor—a parity policy-making body."

Rose made it clear that whatever the student participation it would be minimal and ineffective.

This is where the situation rested until late January of this year when, at a student union meeting attended by over 60 students, the union decided to "remove all students from the policy committees."

At a meeting January 29 over 80 students voted to make six demands:

- All "professional values" for tenure, until there is student should become student controlled, student directed and student evaluated.

- More course flexibility through a re-evaluation of course content and requirements and more independent study programs.

- Students' records should be open to inspection by the individual student on request.

- No students should be admitted to the 1974-75 class until student parity on committees making admissions decisions is achieved.

- No staff or field instructors are to be hired, fired, appointed, given tenure, or recommended for tenure, until there is student parity on all committees making these decisions.

- A parity faculty council should be established to realize a more equitable distribution of power.

The faculty then tried the most common trick at this university—a negotiating committee. The committee would allow the issue to be diffused as have so many other issues in the past, granting students minor, not substantive gains.

Unfortunately, the faculty, for its part, only agreed to negotiate "the framework within which consideration may be given to the six points raised in the student union memorandum."

The term "framework" was meant to include only "such matters as the nature of the university, negotiations, time, place, frequency, of meetings, the amount of freedom within which the constitution of the university that each of the two parties to the negotiations will have to reach conclusions, and similar considerations."

Fortunately, the social work students were astute enough to realize the faculty's game and decided to call the strike to express their dissatisfaction with the "negotiations."

A student union leaflet states: "In the opinion of the student union, the actual accomplishments of the negotiating process have been at best minimal. It has become clear that the teaching faculty's adherence to a consensus approach to decision-making has resulted in an intolerably slow and insulting response to student initiative."

"They (the faculty) clearly do not want a parity system on any groups, committees or bodies that in fact make and implement decisions."

"The teaching faculty accepts without even the most minimal protest actions taken by the larger university administration which deprives the faculty of its power and autonomy. We are clearly facing a situation in which the teaching faculty will oppose students, but bow to the edicts of most incisively in the editorial pages of The Varsity to see the major issues of the times being debated in the pages of the Globe and Mail. On February 21, one Mr. Bill McNeil raised an issue which, I feel, Mr. Editor, would be of interest to the readers of The Varsity. Mr. McNeil protests against supermarkets with no-smoking rules, and in doing so, defends the liberties of us all. He, for one, announces his resolve not to knuckle under to every "petty tyrant (who) has decided to impose yet another foolish, arbitrary and moralistic decision on those he feels are unable to fight back."

I applaud this spirit, Mr. Editor.

Doctors remove malignant growth from Varsity boxes

The administration must have seen Humphrey Bogart starring in Casablanca and thought that the joining of newspaper boxes "was the start of a beautiful relationship."

We disagreed, however, and told Simcoe Hall it had picked the wrong box to contaminate. While we readily admit politics makes strange bedfellows, this is ridiculous.

A Bulletin box growing like a cancer on the side of those cute little Varsity "honor" boxes? Tut, tut,.....

We felt rather boxed in, so external affairs member J.D. Hamilton agreed to have the Bulletin boxes moved a safe (and respectable) distance away. After all, we wouldn't want to have an independent student-run newspaper confused with an administration house organ like the Bulletin.

Coming soon to a campus near you—the all-new segregated Varsity box; and the sooner the boxes are separated the sooner we'll start dropping papers into them again.

Bet you can't wait, eh?

the university administration."

Therein lies the real crunch. The faculty can't act because the university administration amassed considerable power. However, the university administration is clever at using the faculty to channel student discontent on this issue.

The Students' Administrative Council has supported the strike. We hope that if a strike and boycott of classes doesn't accomplish anything positive, that students will move to use other tactics.

done smoking in the presence of non-smokers, while it frowns on faking in the presence of non-farters? Surely the right to fart, Mr. Editor, is entitled to at least equal consideration, and, furthermore, can claim to be a response to a definite physical, as well as psychological need. This arbitrary discrimination against farting cannot be tolerated by anyone who subscribes, Mr. Editor, to the motto that "The subject who is truly loyal to the Chief Magistrate will neither advise nor submit to arbitrary measures."

I invite The Varsity to take a stand on this issue.

Fascism must be distinguished from conservatism

In the past month, a debate has begun on campus as well as off on the questions of the nature of right-wing philosophies including fascism and what should be the response of students and others to its appearance. This debate has arisen largely as a result of the emergence of a small group called the Campus Alternative, and because of the attitude that the Revolutionary Marxist Group has taken to this group.

Campus Alternative is a front for Paul Fromm's Countdown magazine. A founder of the Edmund Burke Society, with a long history of right-wing activity, Fromm comes to break from his former associates in the Western Guard some time back because he felt that the period was not favorable for the "militarist activity" which that group saw as its main means of winning support. Instead of conducting activities like physical assaults on socialist gatherings and smashing left bookstores, Fromm thought it necessary to organize a real base. Fromm's perspective is to construct, through his definition of "democratic conservatism", a protective covering for anti-working class agitation.

Campus Alternative stands for the deportation of non-whites, American war resisters, and Jews, for sexist ideology and practices, for the banning of trade unions which engage in strikes, against the struggle of women for equality, for psychological forced "readjustment" of homosexuals, for apartheid in South Africa, and so on.

Fromm has retreated to higher ground in the form of "democratic conservatism". His most vocal associate in the Campus Alternative, James P. Hull, is the author of numerous articles defending apartheid in South Africa.

Despite what the Toronto Sun and the Campus Alternative would have their audience believe, the RMG does not label all opponents 'fascist'. The struggle against fascism is not the same as the struggle against conservatism. Fascism is a social movement based on the frustrations of the middle classes when faced with economic and political crisis. It is used by the ruling class in times of economic and/or political crisis to institute a highly centralized state apparatus in order to rationalize the economic and political structure. Its primary method and goal is the political and organizational crushing of the working class, its vanguard, and its mass organizations, like the trade unions.

As stated in the Old Mole, the paper of the RMG, "we have no fear of the fascist groupuscules winning support at present through occasional access to mass audiences. On the other hand, we see not interest in presenting such forces with an easy road to such openings. . . . Thus, while we accept that the fascist current in Canada is small and isolated we point out that the need to organize against it is an immediate one, demanding the broadest possible unity in the workers' movement against its rise." Here lies the critical question for the future. Organizing against fascists on university campuses can make it more difficult for them to establish a visible base, but in the longer term it is the working class, acting independently of the state, which will decide if fascism is defeated in the historical sense.

Our position, which flows from this analysis, is that fascists should not be allowed to have platforms from which to present their racist, anti-Semitic, sexist, and anti-working class ideas.

Around this position, we have organized with others to fight against an American white supremacist speaker on "Under Attack" at Trent and Brock universities. Here, at U of T, we have organized to stop Campus Alternative from establishing itself.

It is not surprising that the response of the capitalist press to this activity has been an amazing amount of red-baiting, slander, and wailing about the "attack on liberalism". To date, the Toronto Sun has carried two editorials, and one column each by MacKenzie Porter and Peter Worthington attacking us. The RMG and other students at Trent (in fact, some 40 per cent of the student population) were characterized as "Marxist tyrants". The reason behind all this hysteria is quite simple. The capitalist press, especially the Sun, have been acting to discredit the issues we raise through an extraordinary campaign of red-baiting aimed at isolating us. In the case of the Star, this takes the form of the usual moralism posed by the liberal bourgeoisie when faced with economic and social crisis—blame it on the left. The Sun is more virulent, acting as it does to legitimize reactionary forces behind its right wing populist banner. The close ties between those forces and the Sun editors are quite obvious to those who read the paper critically.

The Sun's campaign against the RMG is aimed in one direction. First, it is seeding the terrain of anti-communism at the same time as making fraternal criticism of the Western Guard. This tactic is aimed at creating an atmosphere where the extreme right will be able to assault revolutionaries. The Sun will say, "we told you so" and call for further repression of the left along the lines of the police attacks on pickets at Artistic Woodwork, banning the RMG on campuses, etc. This is the course being followed by the Sun in attempting to build, on the one hand, a cover for the fascist right and, on the other hand, a ban (in the long term) of "extremists", meaning the revolutionary left.

For liberals and leftists to pose the question of opposing the rise of fascism as a question of "democratic rights" or "freedom of speech" is to ignore the basic lessons of history. The tasks of the workers' movement and its allies is to unite to defend the gains made in struggle, including the organizations and standard of living of the working class. Waving constitutions and the British North America Act ignores the fact (as the Artistic trials) that the workers' movement is only able to retain those rights that it is prepared to fight for. The right to strike, the right to unions of the workers' choice, are under attack in every advanced capitalist country at the same time as the standard of living is undermined by inflation. Facing desperate economic crises if the workers' movement refuses to accept these attacks passively, the bourgeoisie will begin to opt for more overtly repressive methods (as implied now by Heath) and some capitalist layers could begin to covertly support fascist alternatives.

The question is thus one of firm and united action in response to attacks on the workers' movement and to the rise of fascist groups at all points—not deferring such steps until some time in the future when the right becomes a more obvious threat.

The Revolutionary Marxist Group organizes around the slogan NO PLATFORM FOR FASCISTS. By this we mean that the fascist organizations must be prevented from organizing and advocating their reactionary ideology. It is not against "free speech" that we fight. Again, we do not suggest even that "conservative" viewpoints should not be allowed a platform and subjected to debate. We are speaking here of fascism.

Concretely, for the present, we propose the setting up of a coordinating committee of all anti-fascist forces to do the following:

- 1) conduct political propaganda to educate about the importance of the question, its present and future implications, to absorb the lessons of past tragedy and to prepare to combat the future threat of fascism.

- 2) to organize the united defence of left meetings. Concretely we can see the importance of this by looking at the meeting with Michel Chartrand three years ago. When the meeting was attacked by fascists an organized defence guard was able to repel the attack and allow the meeting to continue. This was a significant defeat for the fascists, and after it they were less evident for quite some time.

- 3) to organize active opposition to the dissemination of fascist ideas, through the implementation of "No Platform for Fascists."

It really is a question of which side you are on. Not to take sides is to take sides.

Apartheid benefits blacks

It has been with considerable interest that I have been following the debate in your columns on South Africa. Having recently returned from a six week visit to the country, I find myself agreeing substantially with the views expressed by Mr. Hull. I found in South Africa a genuine concern amongst all peoples White and Black for solving some of the problems of that country. In fact in speaking with many Blacks, I found them quite enthusiastic about their future under the policy of Separate Development.

I also found among the White community a genuine concern for good race relations and that other sectors of the community get a 'fair deal'. When it comes to criticism from abroad against South Africa, a situation which the people of South Africa are aware of through their free press, they point with justification to the treatment that Canada has meted out to her Indians. Certainly having been able to compare the lot of the South African Black with the Canadian Indian, the South African Black certainly has the advantage.

In fact Separate Development has led to such an improvement in race relations it has been admitted by that arch enemy of the South African government Alan Paton in 1972 when he wrote "The Bantustan policy is a fact of life at present and should on the positive side be accepted... It's chief value appears to lie in it's potential for lessening White fears and satisfying some Black aspirations. This potential of the policy for bringing about a more relaxed relationship between the races should be exploited..."

Ms. Hurlich and Professor Puritt accuse Mr. Hull of being a liar, certainly judging from the article he has written I could not agree less. I would agree with Mr. Hull's assertion that the standard of living of the non-White South African is rapidly rising. Travelling over 4,000 miles around the Republic we noticed no more 'shanty' towns of the Sophiatown type, although we saw where they once stood, having been replaced by attractive homes of two to three bedrooms, with a lounge-dining room, large kitchen with bathroom facilities. Certainly there was not much variety between the houses, but many had attractive gardens. Large sports facilities, shopping centres with the Black people running and owning them, were being developed successfully.

I would agree also with Mr. Hull that the South Africans needed not our criticism but our support. It is very easy at a distance to solve the problems of other peoples especially when you do not have to live with the solution. Ever since the last war people opposed to the policies of the policies of the South African government have prophesied every imaginable disaster on South Africa. Nearly 30 years later they are still waiting in vain. South Africa is nowhere near a violent revolution, despite strenuous efforts in some quarters through boycotts to weaken the South African Government and the expected revolution. Terrorists from neighbouring states who manage to cross into South Africa are today fighting Black troops who are defending their country against the people who have come to 'liberate' them.

Much of the campaign against

South Africa is directed by those who have a hatred for the Afrikaner people, who have fought for close on 200 years for their place in South Africa, not to rule others but the right to rule themselves, a right which they are passing on to the other peoples of South Africa. A right which many Canadian Indians are struggling to achieve. I personally wish them luck.

Hart House ads are objectionable

On behalf of the Executive Committee of the Graduate Students' Union, I would like to express our objection to the advertisements for the Gallery Club currently appearing in the "Unclassified" section of the Varsity.

One recent ad read: "Take a dolly to dinner." While Hart House now allows students of both sexes to become members, the administration apparently still does not consider women as equal members to men. Besides presenting a sexist view of women as "dolls", decorations or playthings, this ad is aimed at a male audience, thus implying that only men have free access to this elite "Club", and that women must be graced with an invitation or stay out!

A subsequent ad encouraged readers: "Let your parents treat you to dinner. Bring them to the Gallery Club." This piece of copy presents a distorted view of students as greedy, dependent individuals who get together with their parents with the intent of soaking them for a free meal!

We take exception to the use of such dated and stereotyped images of women, and of university students in general. These advertisements are a discredit to Hart House. Are we to believe that the ancient exterior of the building symbolizes the kind of attitudes that are formed inside? Are the authors of these ads intended them to be camp, we think his effort fell flat.

Leftists threaten freedom of speech

The proliferation of communist groups of various shapes and sizes and colours in the lobby of Sidney Smith Hall does, among other things, serve to fill out the space of an otherwise cavernous interior. Yet, even given this monopolization of the lobby by the communists and their kin, it seems to me that there is enough space left over for other groups, political or whatever, to set up their displays as well. So the problem of Lebensraum for display stands should not be an issue here.

Based at the very heart of the university's arts section, the propagators of leftist ideology have a favourable location from which to carry on their work. The face no visible interference whatsoever. It seems, however, that some of these champions of social justice can become quite uncivilized when faced with views that are not compatible with their own positions.

On Monday morning February 4, it appeared that members of the leftist groups were prominent among the people who swamped the display table of the so-called Campus Alternative group. If any passer-by had wished then and there to sound out the Alternative he would have found it virtually impossible to do so. In fact, one gentleman, most likely motivated by intellectual curiosity, braved physical threats, not to mention insults, and was forced to remove his glasses in order to reach the front of the Alternative table scaled off as it was by a coarse crowd of self-appointed censors.

If the Alternative group, in setting up its stand, was acting within the university rules governing such general activities the I feel it is unjust for anyone to disrupt or obstruct its endeavour. If, on the other hand, the Alternative was breaking university regulations by setting up shop where it did, then the proper university authorities should have been notified by those concerned. Under circumstances where there is a viable law enforcement agency, the resort to vigilance committees is uncalled for. They only serve to generate confusion and to endanger property and the safety of individuals.

Any attempt to interfere with freedom of expression and freedom of movement at a university, of all places, should be scrutinized.

Leg-spreading doesn't matter

I don't see what the revelation that Uli Diemer cannot imagine Princess Anne "spreading her legs" contributes to his otherwise worthwhile reflections on cricket memoirs in last Friday's Varsity. That the princess is not an especially interesting public personality is beyond dispute (and who cares, anyway? Surely not Mr. Diemer) but for him to express it in this way was thoughtless and sexist. It is easy, and also depressingly unoriginal, to put a woman down in sexual terms; to quote Mr. Diemer, it is "a cover for the most brutal, if refined, neanderthal reaction". Why should the fact that a man cannot imagine a particular woman "spreading her legs" have anything to do with the sort of person she is? Mr. Diemer describes himself more clearly than he describes the woman he is talking about. Expressing a personal judgement in these terms indicates just the same failure of human sensitivity that Mr. Diemer was deploring in his article.

Abortion, euthanasia condemned at forum

By ANNE HEALY

To live or die?—that was the question under discussion at the St. Lawrence Centre Sunday afternoon, at one of a series of forums presented by the Public Affairs Department of Toronto Arts.

The "discussion" was presented in co-operation with the Toronto Right to Life Association, which was formed three years ago "to promote respect for all forms of human life from the moment of conception onward."

In actual fact the discussion turned into more of a display in public speaking than a debate. Everyone was on the same side—motherhood is good.

From the opening comments of the moderator—Larry Henderson, editor of the Catholic Register—comparing abortion to the Nazi concentration camps, to the enthusiastic applause of the audience throughout the afternoon, a common feeling was apparent: a strong affirmation of human life, at any stage.

Abortion; "mercy killing" of terminally ill; euthanasia of mentally retarded, physically handicapped, or simply old people were all topics under review.

Jill Knight, Conservative member of the British parliament, opened by asserting: "The more people know about abortion, the less they can support it."

She maintains that too many people think of a fetus as "just a blob," when it has more than just "potential" to become a human being—it is one.

She also pointed out that the right of this unborn member of our society is being violated when it is condemned to defenceless death.

Knight further argued that "this 'unwanted' business" was not a sufficient case for abortion, either. She presented three reasons for this.

First, suppose the baby grows up and decides his mother is no longer "wanted." Can he then kill her?

Secondly, no one can see into the future, and the mother-to-be may suddenly decide she really wants a baby. After the abortion it is too late.

Thirdly, even if the mother still doesn't want the baby at birth, someone else might. Who can say for sure that the child will have a "battered" life, she asked.

The high element of risk involved in abortions is seldom realized by the women, according to Knight.

Abortion increases the chance of sterility, malformation of future children, extra-uterine pregnancy, not to mention the psychological damage it may cause. "In sum," she said, "the woman whom this operation is to help, is likely to be harmed."

Dr. L.L. Deveber, associate

British Conservative MP Jill Knight spoke against abortion

professor of pediatrics at the University of Western Ontario, talked of the various levels where a decision whether to let patients die is necessary.

He was concerned with who should make the decision and on what basis. Accurate diagnosis and prognosis are very important, according to Deveber.

In all cases he said, one must use as a guideline the object of preserving life. The moderator observed that "one's right to life is no longer sacred, but is something one has to prove."

Sister St. Michael Guinan, a prominent gerontologist and consultant to the Ontario government, told the audience that the aged are "the best years of society's life."

They contribute a lot through the wisdom gained from experience. She said that old people possess "the wisdom of the necessity of a good community. . . If we neglect them, we are neglecting one of our greatest resources."

Dr. R. Gallop, head of the food science department at the University of Manitoba, explained that society cannot use the population exposition or any food shortage as an excuse for euthanasia or abortion.

According to him: "All the people who say we're destroying our resources are mad." We are masters of the re-cycling process.

He maintains that the upward curve of the population explosion "cannot exponentially go much beyond where it already is. . . It is bound to fall soon."

We're lacking the wrong population explosion in terms of food supply, he continued. The rodent population, which is so destructive, should be our target. His solution—give them the Pill.

He pointed to the fact that Japan is the only nation that feeds more food to its people than its livestock, and complained about the astounding consumption of pets.

In conclusion Dr. Gallop said: "We have gone mad. We have decided to attack our own offspring. . . A society that turns on its young and its old, is dying. . . This is an inversion of creation—man choosing to be boss, when he is only an employee of God."

Knight at one point said that "we must do more on family planning, than on planning for more abortions. . . getting rid of the problem rather than the pregnancy." We must concentrate more, not on killing off our people, but rather on solving the problems provoking this death-wish.

According to Knight, "We mustn't think just because Nature has deprived them (the disabled) of so much, man has the right to deprive them of everything." Sister St. Michael emphatically agreed: "We must not be destroyed by the attitude that the value of human life is negligible."

Public 'seduced' into waste

MONTREAL (CUPI) — The average Canadian consumer is daily seduced into wasting greater quantities of Canada's non-renewable energy supplies, Marion Bretchin, national president of the Consumers Association of Canada told Sir George Williams University students recently.

Bretchin who represents an organization of 110,000 members across Canada, accused cleverly organized advertising campaigns and the development of new technology in home appliances for increasing energy consumption. At the same time she criticized the large business interests for lulling the consumer into believing that Canada possesses great stores of energy reserves hidden somewhere in the frozen Arctic.

"The manipulation of the Canadian consumer must end," said Bretchin. "Full access to information on Canada's actual energy reserves is a vital necessity if the Canadian consumer is to become an active participant in the development of Canada."

Bretchin emphasized that the Canadian consumer him/herself must assume an important role in the trade-off of Canada's non-renewable energy reserves. For example, she said, Appalachian coal is burned to generate electricity for export to the American market. This process produces thermal energy, the most inefficient use of coal, gas or oil.

"The electricity producers are spending millions of dollars a year to encourage us to use electricity in our homes," continued Bretchin. "Advertising should be used to assist the consumer in learning to utilize electricity efficiently."

Bretchin pointed out that more energy is wasted in buying self defrosting refrigerators and self cleaning ovens. Even different makes of the same appliance have varying levels of energy consumption.

Projects such as Churchill Falls, James Bay and the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline should be questioned by the Canadian consumer, said Bretchin. She explained that when the cost benefit analysis is calculated, the only ones who profit from these developments are big industry. The energy produced by these projects is channelled to fuel the power hungry United States. On the other hand, Bretchin pointed out that these three projects are built by a few men imported for the specialized work and that very few new jobs are created for the native population. The projects do not contribute to the development of secondary industry and supercede the status of the land and the aboriginal rights of its residents.

Bretchin questions to what amount the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline will benefit Canadians. She said the benefits will fall to the international oil companies.

"The action of the Arab countries may be beneficial, if we take it seriously," concluded Bretchin. "Because oil was so cheap, we had not looked to other sources of energy such as solar or even considered a new design of products to last longer and to be recycled. Society has to change its mind in the use of energy," she said. "The environmental costs must be borne by all Canadians."

For whom does Bell Canada toll? Corporations, government, itself...

The following feature, translated and adapted from Bulletin Populaire, a Quebec bi-weekly magazine, analyzes the role and increasing power of Bell Canada. Bell is appearing before the Canadian Transport Commission to ask for another rate increase in what has become an annual appeal for more funds (read: profits).

A complementary article to this feature can be found in the current issue of Last Post magazine, available from the U of T Bookroom. The Last Post article by Robert Chodos and Drummond Burgess explores the corporate links between Northern Electric and Bell Canada and traces Northern's multi-national status and its US connections.

Have you ever tried to do without a telephone for a week, a month? Did you ever move without having a new telephone installed? Very few people can respond negatively to these questions. Furthermore, virtually everyone recognizes that a telephone is essential. And no one realizes this fact better than Bell Canada; that's the reason Bell's system keeps growing.

Bell Canada's, in reality, a public service owned by private interests and in this one comment there exists a great deal of ambivalence and ambiguity when considering Bell Canada's federal regulations. One doesn't have to look very far to discover the type of "public utility" offered by this telephone service. Who today hasn't used a telephone, leased by Bell? But the individual telephone subscriber is only one of seven million others forced to use the same company.

Bell's territory takes in almost all of Quebec and Ontario, a section of Labrador and the Northwest Territories. Moreover, thanks to its subsidiaries, Bell exercises a quasi-monopoly on the Maritime provinces' service.

An increase every year

Our federal government is supposed to act like a "shepherd keeping watch over his flock", but in reality it doesn't. As a public service Bell Canada must "subject" itself to the Canadian Transport Commission (CTC). The commission must then look at, study and approve every rate hike asked for by this "public service". In practice this means:

Year	Increase asked	Increase given
1968-69	$83.6 million	$27.5 million
1970	$30 million	$22.5 million
1971-72	$78.1 million	$47.2 million
1973
(request A)	$36 million	$22 million
(request B)	$85.2 million	?

However, the $22 million increase authorized by the CTC for request A raised such opposition that the federal government decided in April, 1973, to suspend the increase pending further study. But this sudden opposition didn't have any long-lasting effect. During June last year Ottawa studied and then accepted a rate increase (effective July 3) which should have added supplementary revenue of some $11.4 million to Bell Canada's coffers. Following this decision the company announced a revision and a decrease in its demands for rate hikes (request B). Bell indicated to the CTC that its needs for additional revenue no longer amounted to $85.2 million but "only" $51.8 million! Moreover, this raise if it goes through will be enough to produce a rate of return of 8.6 per cent in 1974.

For the average person who rents a telephone, this means, practically speaking, that the monthly base rate will go to $6.50 (in Montreal) and $6.25 (in Quebec City). The installation charge for a single line will cost $12 and each time you commit the "unpardonable sin" of asking the information operator for a number which can be found in the telephone directory, it will cost you $0.25. The cost for a call placed from a telephone booth will double, rising to $0.20.

How does Bell Canada arrive at these figures so easily?

What, in fact, is Bell Canada?

To begin with, Bell Canada is the third most important private company in Canada. With assets worth more than $4 billion, Bell has 35 subsidiaries or affiliated companies. The organization employs 41,000 people (for the most part women).

An essential public service, Bell Canada is also, above all, thanks to the federal government (or, because of the inertia of the other levels of government) a private monopoly of the first degree.

The shareholders

To those who ask its ownership Bell Canada brags that it's owned 98 per cent by Canadian interests. The two per cent balance is owned by the giant American Telephone and Telegraph Company. But this two per cent is not such a negligible amount.

There are, in effect 230,000 shareholders of ordinary Bell shares. More than two-thirds of these shareholders own less than 100 shares each. However AT and T owns one of the largest blocks of shares in Bell Canada (if not, in fact, the largest) and effectively controls the company. Even Bell's organizational patterns are practically copies of those of its neighbour and the research services of the two companies work in close collaboration.

A company as important as Bell Canada needs equally enormous sums for exploitation which must be financed some way or other. Bell Canada's financial backing in this case comes from the powerful financial syndicate of St. James Street in Montreal. At the head of the group is the Bank of Montreal, but it also includes a group of insurance brokers under the direction of Sun Life, and, as intermediate business agents, A.E. Ames and Co. All of these companies and financial houses are connected in one way or other to the rest, and Bell Canada only adds another corporation to the interlocking pattern.

Another one big happy family

In principle, Bell Canada only serves Quebec, Ontario, Labrador and the Northwest Territories. But even here one finds the common practice of monopolies; a network of subsidiaries. And Bell Canada, in this area, has a good deal of experience. The company holds a majority in many telephone companies serving Eastern Canada: New Brunswick Telephone Company (51.4 per cent), Newfoundland Telephone Company (100 per cent), Maritime Telegraph and Telephone (52 per cent), etc., without counting the subsidiaries of these subsidiaries. And in these cases the company plays a nice game of bringing out the jurisdictional disputes between the federal and provincial governments.

In effect, only two of some 400 telephone firms fall under federal jurisdiction — Bell Canada and British Columbia Telephone. Bell then has every interest in enlarging the field of its subsidiaries — which are not subject to federal regulation — and creating new ones, to escape the indiscrete watch of the different levels of government or regulatory bodies.

From this corporate structure comes Telebec Inc., with a provincial charter in Quebec, a subsidiary set up to rationalize Bell Canada's acquisitions in Quebec. Tele-Direct, partly a subsidiary but autonomous in nature is in charge of all publicity aspects and of production and distribution of the telephone directories. Tele-direct did $40 million worth of business in 1972.

However, the most important subsidiary of Bell Canada (and detached from it) is Northern Electric. With business interests surpassing the $500 million mark, Northern is the most important manufacturer of communications equipment in the country and Bell Canada finds itself, therefore, obliged to buy almost 50 per cent of its production from its own subsidiary. And it does this, of course, with very few complaints on the parent's part.

One of Bell's principal arguments before the Canadian Transport Committee for an increase is that its costs of operation have continuously gone up. And the price for telephone and electronic equipment paid by Bell to its subsidiary, Northern Electric, has to be considered in its pleas for an increase.

Evidently, the CTC is unable to fall back on these facts since Northern lies outside its jurisdiction. Thus, thanks to diverse manipulations, Bell Canada is able to succeed in camouflaging the true situation of the company from the eyes of the government and the public. With its large amount of capital, Bell, moreover, can hire throughout the year a strong team of technocrats and lawyers to prepare the company's evidence for its demands for rate increases—evidence which evidently doesn't contain all the necessary facts to judge the financial health of our "public service".

Furthermore, Bell Canada comes before the CTC so often and with such elaborately prepared documentation that no other body, much less a government regulating agency, and still less a group of concerned citizens, can oppose the forceful arguments of the company's demands.

Thus Bell Canada has all the latitude it could want to obtain the necessary rate hikes to protect its interests and extend its monopoly control. And we shouldn't allow ourselves to be fooled by the difference between "hike asked for" and "increase authorized", and still less by the last "voluntary" reduction of the company's demands.

During past years the CTC has tried to establish scales for the telephone companies under its jurisdiction. To each of these requests Bell Canada has obtained (and always obtains) a "softening" of its preceding position. And the monopoly still carries on extremely well.

Being an essential public service, every Bell Canada rate increase has inevitable repercussions on the situation of the people who depend on this "service". What about the people with a modest income, the sick and injured, the unemployed and the socially assisted whose arguments with the government bureaucracy are carried out regularly over the telephone? The CTC, protector of the public interest doesn't appear to feel that it's role is to protect these people.

In a decision handed down in 1972, the CTC declared that it did not necessarily have to take into consideration regional differences and differences of income in determining the rates. "The impact of the hike on those economically weak evidently was considered by the Commission, but it does not, however, have the discretionary power to adjust the rates with regard to the particular economic situation of the subscribers in the same category."

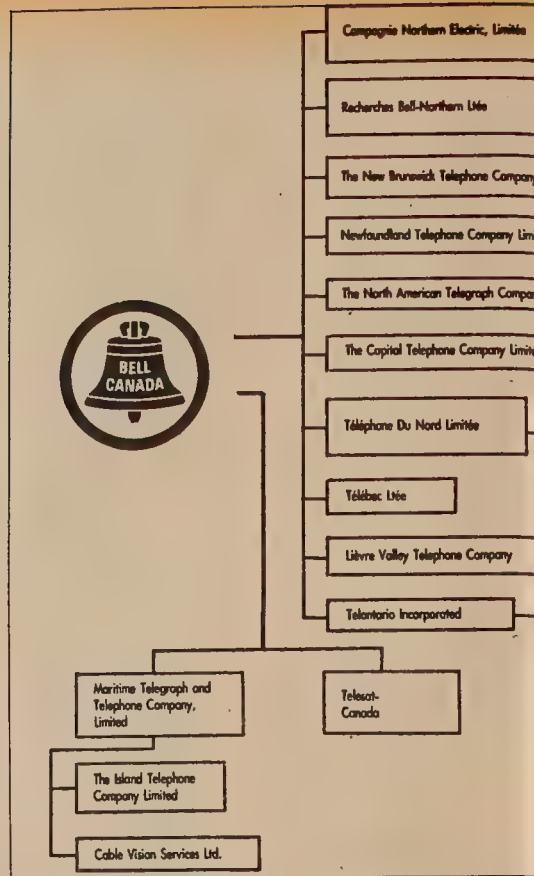

But if the Commission doesn't have this power, Bell Canada, for its part, can grant these differences without asking permission to do so.

The poor and Bell Canada

Bell Canada has, in effect, claimed (appropriated upon itself) the power to "classify" its customers according to their income level, and this little known practice represents a direct discrimination towards the people most dependent on this essential service. Customers in class "A" are obviously the governments and private corporations. Customers in class B are allowed to have a two-month carry-over on their bills provided the total doesn't exceed $25, or the cost for one month isn't above a sum up to 10 times the charges of the local service.

Bell Canada grants a $15 "leeway" to class "C" and $10 to class "D". However, if you are poor and end up being placed in class "M", Bell Canada will demand a guarantee of your credit with a $50 deposit (or more) payable in advance, before your equipment is installed.

But discrimination goes even further than that. Corporations and governments always receive calls for overdue bills; but pensioners in class M receive, for their part, a notice of discontinuation of service and have their telephones disconnected after 10 days. The treatment of customers bills is made in a selected manner by Bell Canada who show themselves to be intractable with those people who haven't had the good fortune to have a good deal of money. One typical case, recounted by the Self-defense Committee against the Bell Rate Hikes (a popular organization based in Montreal) provides us with one example.

Pay or go without

An 87-year old woman and their daughter (in her sixties) made the mistake of accumulating a debt of $37.09 on their bill. The daughter spoke to employees in Bell's accounting department and offered to pay half the sum that month and the remainder the following month.

However, this arrangement wasn't acceptable to the normal Bell practice for handling the accounts of people in class "M" and the telephone was removed from their home two days later. This decision forced a woman over 60 years old suffering from a heart condition to walk over three streets to make telephone calls. In spite of the intervention of the self-defense committee the collection process was set in motion and the daughter received a bill asking her to pay the full amount of the bill or run the risk of legal charges. Meanwhile, during this period the loss of telephone service caused serious anxiety to these two elderly people.

According to Bell Canada the only way to remedy the situation was to turn in a payment to $37.09 immediately, to which was added $11, as an advance on the following month's service and to cover the costs of reinstallation. These two women, faced with a civil tribunal hearing, weren't able to solve the problem without borrowing the necessary amount to satisfy the monopoly public service.

"Princess, touch-tone, Contempora and tra-la-lia"

Bell Canada finds itself faced with a captive market because of its monopoly situation. To increase its advantage and its profits, the company must then depend strongly on the revenue gained from its service charges. These charges are obviously much higher for telephone equipment that's more expensive.

The "touch-tone", Princess and Contempora equipment—these two or three different machines found in a home—cannot for one minute pretend to provide better service than the ordinary black phone model. You certainly aren't able to speak better because of a color Contempora. But even so the standard black machine risks soon becoming a museum piece because Bell Canada has to sell its most expensive equipment to assure its stockholders an "attractive" return on investment.

Towards this end Bell Canada has developed and imposed on its employees selling tactics for the less aggressive. Thus, not only operators, but even the service men (the installation people) have become wandering key-board equipment" a salesman will hesitate to replace a machine to replace a telephone and another about the qualities (?) etc. He will even go so far that he was supposed when he goes to install

Sales under pressure

It's not difficult to judge about the sales method pressure.

Unnecessary machines and satellites

By comparison with this 100 per cent hike (the most important demand by Bell Canada in its forthcoming request B), we might note one of the reductions granted by the company.

Trans-Canada Telephone. The monthly cost for proximately $15 million invested in the Telesat system, controlled by a company associated with Bell Telephone.

In short, in four years, the authorized increases have been around $108.6 million, and now Bell is appealing for an additional $51.8 million, and all this for the necessity of a public utility service which has hardly improved.

Bell, an agent of inflation

Even the Quebec government publicly opposed (through the solicitors for the minister of communications) Bell Canada's practices at the CTC hearings! "Bell Canada is one of the most important causes of inflation in Canada. The growth of salaries and the manipulative practices agreed to by Bell Canada exceeds the national means and falls under the category of "large wage settlements", which is one of the contributing factors to the phenomenal increase in the consumer price index."

In granting salary increases clearly superior to the average rate of increase, the company obviously assures the collaboration of a business syndicate which greatly displeases the government. By these generous increases Bell draws into it a whole sector of industry which relies upon political means to demand even more money.

On the other hand the costs of communications services necessarily intervenes in the cost of living index. This small 1.23 per cent increase of your monthly payments, added to other small "negligible and insignificant" percentages, helps strangle a person's budget even further.
Telephone subscribers must, in the final analysis, pay for this generosity through increased costs.

The example of Telebec is particularly revealing to this practice. This Québec corporation has a tendency to appear to be almost blindy generous, but it's quick to pass on the cost of this generosity to the public. Under Bell Canada's direction, Telebec has purchased small telephone firms in Québec at a price clearly higher than what these firms are worth. But then Telebec tried to obtain from the public service administration (Québec's regulating agency) the right to invoice the users for heavy financial charges.

It goes without saying that the parent firm does not proceed in any different manner. In revealing its generosity to its employees, Bell Canada maintains excellent relations with the employees, but at the same time it asks the CTC for authorization to increase its rates.

The disconcerting ease with which Bell Canada regularly obtains important rate increases illustrates once again (if that's necessary) the inability of the different levels of government and the futility of their pretensions to "control" such powerful monopolies. And these same monopolies were granted willingly by private interests.

The Canadian Transport Commission understands well that it is not supposed to study too closely the "private" business affairs of Bell Canada: it isn't under its jurisdiction. The decisions handed down by the CTC only rest therefore on the "proof" presented by the company itself, unless our regulating body has the care, (or the desire or the possibility) to verify this evidence.
One particularly striking example follows:

In January 1972, Bell Canada anticipated spending some $575 million for its 1973 construction program. In July 1972 these estimates surpassed the $540-$550 million limit. This construction program is in fact one of the principle reasons used by Bell Canada to justify asking for higher rates. So when the company decided to present its demands before the CTC, In November 1972, it was learned that it's construction program has surpassed the $590 million mark! Yet the CTC will not submit this "inflated figure" to any critical examination: "it doesn't have the means or the power."

Such bodies also do not take the trouble to examine the impact of these annual hikes on the people with low incomes. It's true that professionals, shop keepers, and businessmen can deduct a good part of their telephone expenses from their income tax. But for a family with modest income, it's not at all the same. Any rate hike means an additional "regressive" tax whose weight rests heavily on the family's shoulders.

The socially assisted, the unemployed, the elderly and others who receive a government pension, for their part, see with each new tariff hike their small income eaten away by a monopoly that has other concerns besides the public at heart—namely its own self-interest. But this isn't all.

M.A. Jean de Grandpre, Bell Canada president, has, in effect, proposed to replace the present regulatory process of the CTC with a table of increases of telephone rates geared to the cost of living increases, through using an index similar to the consumer price index. When you realize the spectacular rise in this cost of living increases, through using an index similar to the consumer price index. When you realize the spectacular rise in this cost of living index in the past few years
(The Canadian consumer price index rose past 136.7 in 1972 to 144.5 in 1973. One hundred equals the year 1961) you can without any doubt predict that the annual tariff hikes would almost become monthly ones!

The telephone is an essential public service, and, with this responsibility ought to be accessible to everyone at the lowest possible cost. As long as this service is controlled by a private empire, the consumer will be denied an essential right. The social impact—which affects the individuals as much as the collectivity—of all rate hikes justifies alone the struggle against this example of arrogant corporate power.

Candidates for Governing Council speak on...

Gary Heighington, constituency I

Heighington stresses parity

Gary Heighington, active now as vice-president of Scarborough College Student Council and many other Scarborough groups, is making his first bid for Governing Council in Constituency I for part-time students.

A fourth year history and political science student, he wants to see more student representation in the university and advocates student parity with faculty on departmental tenure committees.

Heighington is against the discipline code: "I don't see why it should be formalized when things are looked after now."

When asked if students needed protection against arbitrary academic sanctions, he said standing committees would be the place for a student appeal.

He said Woods World College for part time students should have its own facilities

Asked how this might be done in light of provincial cutbacks in educational funding, Heighington said the university should consider that part time students are a profit making sector of the university and should receive some consideration from the university.

Other issues for Heighington include the right of part time students to attend all evening courses and summer day courses in the entire university.

He also wants the Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students (APUS) to remain a group which represents all part time students at U of T.

Stein covers many issues

Howie Stein has a platform of many planks in his bid for a seat in the full time undergraduate Constituency I.

Making a strong pitch for higher quality teaching in the university, Stein, a third-year economics student, calls for parity at all levels of university decision-making.

He is against the Conway-Cadario discipline code and says there should be no code at all.

Howard Stein, constituency I

However, realizing the student needs protection against arbitrary action, he says there should be a committee with student parity to hear student academic grievances.

This he says, should be an interim body at the departmental level. He says ultimately there should be no formal academic code until student parity is reached throughout the university.

Concern with racism and sexism at the university are also in Stein's platform. He wants Governing Council to investigate allegations of discrimination in hiring and firing and the teaching of what he calls "pseudo-scientific and slanderous ideology."

He cites the wage inequality between male and female cleaning staff as one area of discrimination.

Other issues for Stein include supporting daycare for students with children, getting the university to conform with the city parking policy, having governing Council set new rules for operational agreement between students and professors in the classroom about teaching, rent controls on all university housing, subsidies on campus food services and no tuition increases.

Millar is a labor candidate

For candidate Drew Millar, his race for the seat in Constituency I administrative staff is a simple case of a workers' candidate to unseat a management incumbent.

An active member of Local 1230 of CUPE which represents the library workers, Millar has been a computer programmer at the library for four years.

He has sharp words for the incumbent John Parker, who in 1972 as U of T's manager of labor relations told library workers during contract negotiations there would be no lay-offs.

A few months later, some library workers were in fact laid off.

Millar says for administrative staff the choice before them is clear: do they want a fellow worker representing them or "an apologist for the university management."

Another area concerning Millar is the possibility the university may contract out existing jobs, thus resulting in lay-offs of university employees.

This resulted in a 40 per cent cut back in Ryerson's janitorial staff, and Millar says university president John Evans is already talking about contracting out some jobs.

Millar has been twice elected to the contract negotiating team of Local 1230 and has served a year on the library's management and union committee.

Jarrett wants representation

Peter Jarrett, Vic III, is stressing student participation in decision making in his first run for political office on campus. A comparatively non-political person Jarrett by his own definition, is trying to represent students, something he feels has not been done by "professional student politicians."

Jarrett has been active primarily in the French Course Union and the controversy over the firing of a popular Victoria French professor. He says this is what made him decide to run for Governing Council.

He is not a complete novice, though, because he has been the chief force behind the French union, one of the most active course unions on campus.

On the discipline code, Jarrett follows the SAC line, believing there should not be a non-academic code but students need the protection of the present academic code on offenses such as cheating and plagiarism.

He also believes in student parity on staffing committees with the proviso that "we have to deserve it."

"I hope that by getting representation at first but not parity, we can prove we are belonging on tenure and other staffing committees," he said.

Jarrett also believes in parity on the Governing Council with faculty though not with non-students. This form of parity would mean only 12 student seats on the 50 member body since there are now 12 faculty members.

On the issue of investigating sexism and racism in the university, Jarrett believes there should be committee set up to investigate racism.

But he said sexism is a problem of the whole society and the university is not unique. When pressed on whether the university should lead in this area he equivocated, saying it was not something the Governing Council can do anything about.

His main concern is improvement in teaching quality and better student representation on the council, going into its third year of existence.

Shirley French, constituency I.

French likes experimentation

Shirley French, running for a seat in the full time undergraduate Constituency I, is concerned over the lack of support for experimental programs such as Innis College and interdisciplinary students.

She criticises the lack of funding and the potential detrimental effect such programs can have on a professor seeking tenure.

French, a second year political science student, says she would like to see new criteria for the granting of tenure and hiring and rejects the no-parity recommendation of the Forster report.

She says she wants to see student parity at all levels of student decision-making.

While she rejects the Conway-Cadario discipline code, she initially was unsure of whether students should have protection against academic wrongs, but concluded there should be a board set up students could appeal to.

Another issue French wants to pursue is wage parity.

She cites "obvious disparities" such as between men and women, and academic and non-academic staff. She says internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway needs to be pushed to act on wage discrimination against women employees.

She advocates continuing support for daycare and says racism at the university should be handled by an appeal board which could hear grievances.

Moses promotes SAC positions

Steve Moses, constituency II.

SAC vice-president Steve Moses brings essentially the SAC position on campus issues into his race for the full time undergraduate seat in Constituency II.

A second year medics student, he is opposed to the Conway-Cadario discipline code "in the present state."

In particular he wants to see no non-academic code, but could live with an academic code if major changes were to be made.

Terry Ruddy

An academic code must "protect students to prevent arbitrary action and discrimination against students" and also protect against such things as essay banks.

However, any such code Moses would want to see passed by a referendum sponsored by Governing Council. Moses also wants the Haist rules written out of an academic code.

Both faculty and students must approve of any such document he says.

Moses also supports SAC's tenure position. He wants to see representation brought in first so faculty and administration can see students performing a constructive role in staffing decision.

He feels opposition to student parity on staffing bodies would disappear once the students' constructive input was proven.

"The problem is getting the principle of students on all committees first," he says.

As a member of the city-university liaison committee, Moses is very sensitive to improved city-community relations.

He feels the community should be consulted along every step of university planning affecting the community and recent efforts in this direction by the administration should be encouraged and increased.

He labels university parking policy one area where the university could improve by implementing the city's parking policy.

Running in the undergraduate full time student constituency II, Terry Ruddy's main platform is based on the paternal attitude students receive at U of T.

He sees the discipline code as an example of that sort of condescending attitude.

Ruddy, a first year med student, says he is in favor of the complete repeal of the code and is opposed to any negotiations over the code such as SAC has carried out.

His views on tenure, however, are not as clear.

Ruddy wrote in his submission which appeared in Governing Council's summary of candidates he "vigorously support(s) student parity in all decisions pertaining to granting of tenure and hiring and firing of professors."

However, in an interview with the Varsity Ruddy said he is in favor of student representation on all tenure committees, but not necessarily parity.

Ruddy told The Varsity since the function of the university is to teach, students should have the majority say in evaluating a professors teaching in the consideration of tenure.

But he said the majority say on a professor's research and future promise in considering tenure ought not to be with students.

Other issues Ruddy sees include the lack of university responsiveness to the community as shown in U of T's non-restrictive parking policy and the university passing off the repairs of the Innis co-op houses to the tenants.

Metro hears briefs on problems of working poor

By MARGARET ROBERTSON

In response to its announced programs to aid the working poor, the Metro social services and housing committee heard briefs on Thursday presented by Peggy Reinhardt and Mike Carson, provincial co-ordinator of the Ontario Anti-Poverty Organization.

However, the Reinhardt brief was not well received by Scarborough Councillor Karl Mallette who commented that he had seen this kind of "garbage" before. His attitude was generally frivolous. Mallette has gone on record as favoring no pets for people on welfare.

Both stressed the need for job upgrading and Carson called for all levels of government to provide work with wages which would be at least equal to the current welfare schedule.

He said there is need for the creation of new job programs, and cited the home construction industry and community projects as two possible areas where these jobs could be generated.

He suggested funding could be provided by taxing wealthy corporations rather than the already overburdened home owner, senior citizens and other working poor.

Carson also said welfare levels should be raised to the poverty level at least in order to ensure all residents a "basic decent standard of living."

The committee was told many people now accepting wages lower than the welfare standards are doing so because they lose "human values" when going on public assistance.

Carson said while his organization fully supported the recommendations for assistance to the working poor for such items as drugs, spectacles and full health care, it was felt that such services should be available to all residents through OHIP.

Peggy Reinhardt, who said she was one of the working poor before becoming a welfare recipient, says: "The working poor are being asked to take up permanent positions in the welfare mess."

She feels the welfare system "was designed as a means of keeping the poor divided and ignorant, as a cheap source of reserve labor and to prevent any real demands for a more equitable distribution of the real wealth within the country."

While casual laborers used to be the "business scapegoat," in her estimation it is now women and students, describing labor legislation to protect women as "quite scarce" in Ontario. It is either harsh or existent, she said.

She told the committee that in 1960 23.7 per cent of secondary school pupils were enrolled in vocational or technical schools, and by 1967 this figure had risen to 45.5 per cent.

"They became committed to semi-obsolete skills before even hitting the job market," she said.

Reinhardt suggested students be paid for studying as a method of ironing out some of the inequalities in the system.

"I think everyone would benefit," she said. "Free choice with fewer financial limitations would attract those who had the ambition and the intellectual capacities."

She also requested day care be available for those mothers who chose to combine outside work with their home duties.

Like Carson, Reinhardt urged the social services department request both governments "to consider an adequate minimum wage that is related to the costs of living in the country."

The committee generally felt such an action by either government is a long way in the future.

The January Metro welfare statistics showed a total of 54,968 people received assistance.

Mixed reaction to Troilus

Clifford Leech describes Troilus and Cressida as a discussion rather than a chronicle play. Indeed, this exploration into the minds of the Greek and Trojan heroes affords voluminous discussions concerning involvement in the legendary war. The intrigue and love relationship between the unfaithful Cressida and the faithful Troilus holds a secondary place to the psychological delving.

The biggest question that I ask after seeing the Martin Hunter production at Hart House is: why was this play chosen? The few action and comic scenes shine, but the long inquiries without resolution tend to be extremely tedious.

Nevertheless the play is full of adept actors. The two lovers, of sufficient interest to be portrayed by literary masters throughout the ages, are excellently cast. Barbara Stewart plays the coquette and temptress skillfully, and Scott MacRae is equally proficient in his role as the cuckolded Troilus.

The two are surrounded by impressive actors. The first that comes to mind is Graham Harley as the old Nestor whose antics add suitable levity to the show. Michele White captivates the audience as Cassandra with her eerie prophecies and mad eyes. Thersites "a deformed and scurrilous Grecian" is our link with the Greek and Trojan world. It is he that sees through the pettiness of the battles and heroes involved. Michael Macina is good as link and acrobat though he often races through his speeches leaving the audience behind.

Pandarus, uncle to Cressida and friend to Troilus is an important vehicle. He is the go-between for the two lovers; yet he's portrayed as too much of a comic character. His sorrow never appears real, only humorous, and the audience is similarly deterred from feeling any sympathy.

Responsibility for the intellectual questioning lies with Agamemnon and Ulysses on the Greek side. Played respectively by John Cartwright and Rod Beattie, the Shakespearean purpose is never made clear.

Standing at the centre of this huge conflict is Helen, the woman with the "face the launched a thousand ships". Though she only appears briefly in this play, her presence should be vibrant and imposing, giving some reason for the Trojan and Grecian suffering. Unfortunately Victoria Bryce who was apparently cast for her buxomness, lacks presence and serves only to intensify the sense of futility.

The electronic music by Christopher Crawford lends an appropriate aura of history to the play. Unfortunately this aura seems incongruous as the background to a basketball game among Priam's sons.

Lawrence Shaffer is to be congratulated for his set costumes and lighting. Though all were relatively simple (with the exception of Pandarus' outlandish garb) they were both functional and pleasing.

Hunter regrettably crowded an already difficult play with slapstick and sometimes unnecessary details. It tended to diminish the importance of the play and leave the audience with a very ambivalent feeling.

Can't quit smoking? Partial lobotomy will do the trick of the brain are probed by electrical leads.

The Gottingen team turned to drug addiction following developments in brain surgery on sexual offenders.

The style of surgery to the brain is not something unknown to Canada, according to Keldani, who says 5,000 persons in Canada received this treatment in the 1950s when it first became popular.

Keldani's group wants the UN group to investigate the German technique to ensure the methods are effective and safe before it is allowed to continue.

The Gottingen groups is not the only one, however, involved in searching the brain for cures to addiction.

A Hong Kong neurosurgeon, Dr. H. L. Wen, claims to have treated almost 100 opium and heroin addicts using a combination of acupuncture and electrotherapy.

Reportedly a painful process, the half-inch acupuncture needle is inserted through the ear, although a British researcher reports the technique has been developed further such that it is less painful.

The Addiction Research Foundation publication, The Journal, claims there are behind the scenes moves afoot to link up the German and the Hong Kong research in western Europe to develop the definitive brain surgery system to tackle addiction.

The Journal claims the research would initially start with hard-core heroin addicts and then branch out to zap alcoholics and chain cigarette smokers.

A Toronto based addiction rehabilitation centre is protesting a West German technique which claims to end drug addiction by destroying a small part of the addict's brain.

Joseph Keldani, Canadian director of Narconon, has sent a telegram to the secretariat of the World Health Organization of the United Nations, urging the experiment's end.

Keldani says the experiments are in effect lobotomies and are in violation of the Neuremburg Code which prohibits experiments which violate a person's body.

Professor Ritz Roeder, a neurologist at Gottingen University, developed a technique in which a section in the hypothalamus part of the brain is destroyed by an electrical probe.

"Our research has revealed that dependence on drugs or alcohol assumes the proportions of a natural urge after a certain period and like the sexual drive or the urge to eat, is controlled by a certain brain centre," the Roeder research team reports.

"Neutralizing this centre, which is no more than 50 cubic millimeters in volume, will cure the patient for all time."

The German research was derived from a North American form of brain research in which various parts

Interfac hockey playoffs start today

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

The long interfaculty hockey season ended Friday with 16 teams out of 29 capturing playoff spots.

In the opening game at 7 pm tonight in the Arena, the division IA winners, Erindale, meet Law I, who won a wild-card playoff berth by the skin of their teeth over Meds A.

Law will have their work cut out for them: during the two regular season games, Erindale defeated them 9-6 and 4-3. Law just might be a giant-killer, however, if they can get hot goaltending from former Blue Bruce Durno.

Following this game, PHE A and Grad I tangle at 8:30. PHE, with 22 points during the regular season, finished a whisker behind Vic I with 23 points and had to settle for third place in division IA.

They should get some stiff competition from the grads who finished in second, two points behind Dents in the IB division. They met once this year, with PHE prevailing 4-2.

The winners from these two series will meet in a two game semi-final on Wednesday, March 6, and Thursday, March 14, in the Arena.

In the other quarter-finals today, SMC meets Dents A at 10:00 this morning, and after that game, Vic I plays New I at 12:30.

SMC finished fourth in division IA with 15 points and should have their hands full against the powerful Dents who captured a first place finish in the IB group. In their interlocking game this season, SMC dumped the dentists 5-2.

Vic I finished their season in second place, with 23 points, two behind the IA league-leading Erindale. New I, who finished third in division II B, will have to play well to overcome Vic. During the regular season, however, New did win a 2-1 squeaker over Vic and it could be the portent of an upset.

The winners of the SMC-Dents and the Vic-New series will play in the other semi-final series Wednesday, March 6, and Wednesday, March 13.

In the division II A and B playoffs, all the quarter-finals begin this Tuesday.

Div IIA winner Jr. Eng take their sterling record (15-1-0) against Knox who scrambled to finish fourth in division IIB. The game begins Tuesday at 12:30.

Two second place finishers, Scar II and Fac Ed meet Tuesday at 7:00 in an evenly matched game. Scar finished with 21 points, (10-3-1) while Fac Ed's record was 11-5-0.

Forestry A captured second spot in the IIA division with their record of 10-4-2. They will cross-over to ply the division IIB third-place finisher, Law II who have an almost identical record. This game is set for 8:30 pm and follows the Scar-Fac Ed Match.

Pharmacy A led division IIB with 22 points, gained from 11 wins and only two losses. They will be lacing up their skates against Vic II, the fourth place finisher in the IIA division with a 8-5-3 record. Their game is scheduled for 10 am Tuesday, March 5.

The intermediate playoffs grind into action when Wednesday rolls around. We'll carry some deathless prose on this fascinating topic in the next issue of the Varsity.

OUAAs ice stars named

By JANET CLARKE

The OUAA hockey all-star teams were released last week.

The University of Toronto placed four members on the eastern section teams, three on the first team and one on the second team.

Waterloo placed six members on the two western section teams, taking five out of six positions on the first team.

In the eastern section, the first team consists of Dave Tataryn (Laurentian) goal, Warren Anderson (Toronto) and Steve Aubrey (Ottawa) defense; Don Pagnutti (Toronto) centre; Tim Ampleford (York), and Kent Ruhnke (Toronto) forwards.

The second team has Alain Larose (Ottawa) in goal; Rick Leroy (Queen's) and Al Milnes (Toronto) on defense; Al Avery (York) as centre, and Mike Fox (Laurentian) and Jim Sunstrum (Queen's) as forwards.

Tataryn was the second-team goaltender last season. In 1971-72, while playing for the Blues, Tataryn was the first team goaltender.

Anderson was a first team all-star defensesman last season. His partner on this year's all-star team, Aubrey, was on last year's second team. Ruhnke, a first-team forward this season, was on last year's second team.

Sunstrum repeats as a second-team forward. His linemate Fox was first-team defensesman last year also with the voyageurs.

In the western section, the first team has Jake Dupuis (Waterloo) in goal; Frank Staubitz (Waterloo) and Randy Stibel (Waterloo) on defense; Mike Guimond (Waterloo) as centre; Dave Edwards (Western) and Russ Elliot (Waterloo) are forwards.

On the second team are Dave Moote (Guelph) in goal; Phil Howard (Western) and Doug McKay (Guelph) on defense; centre Adams Brown (Guelph) and forwards Bill Hanson (Guelph) and Ron Hawkshaw (Waterloo).

Dupuis repeats as the first team goaltender. Guimond repeats as the centre on the first team.

Elliott moved from the second team to the first team while Howard maintained his defense position on the second team.

All other members of the four teams are OUAA all-stars for the first time.

Varsity swimmers are CIAU champions

By PAUL CARSON

Varsity swimmers conspicuously rewrote the record books at the CIAU championships in Sudbury during the weekend as the men's team handily retained their team title and the women placed third in team competition while helping Ontario to win the championship.

Veteran sprinter Jim Adams closed his intercollegiate career with three CIAU records in individual races plus participat in two more record-breaking relays for a total of five gold medals.

Breastroker Jane Wright switched to the individual medley and won gold medals in record time at both 200 and 400 yards. Her male counterpart, John Sebben, also set a CIAU record in winning the 100yard breastroke in 1:01.69.

The meet was held in Laurentian's 50-metre pool complete with electronic timing and, as it happened, very alert judging that resulted in two controversial disqualifications.

Blues had expected to be ahead by about 50 points after the opening two events Thursday night but trailed Alberta 51-35.

Dave Wilkin was over-eager on his leg of the 400-yard medley relay and left the blocks clearly ahead of the touch even though Blues had a five-second lead.

In the other race, Mike Guinness set a blistering pace in the 1,650 freestyle but then slowed down and was eventually caught by Lakehead's Ken Kasgell.

Friday was a different story as Adams promptly shattered the CIAU record with a 1:43.5 in the 200 free and Guinness placed a strong second.

Gre Vanular atoned for a poor showing in the OUAAs finals with a solid second in the 200 backstroke breaking his own lifetime best with a 2:03.1.

Vanular came back shortly to place third in the 100 fly and Russ Farquhar also bettered his lifetime best to finish fifth.

Blues added a fistful of points in the 100 breastroke as Sebben defeated two former Olympians, Doug Jamison and Robert Stoddart, while Lance Aho and Nick Rottman placed one-two in the consolation final.

Fin Temple avenged his loss to Lester Newby in the OUAAs diving by taking the one-metre title and then it was Adams' turn again.

The Varsity captain extended Toronto's hold on the 50 free title 10 consecutive years and his official time of 21.49 is both a CIAU and Canadian Open record. Wilkin came third, only two-one hundredths of a second behind McMaster's George Stepleok as the costly electronic timing proved its worth.

Blues added some unexpected points in the 400 individual medley and then concluded a most satisfactory day by establishing a record of 7:15.1 in the 800 freestyle relay, a full seven seconds faster than the old standard. Dave Chutter joined Adams, Guinness and Sebben in this effort which gave Blues a 226-151 lead over Alberta.

The team championship was unexpectedly settled early Saturday morning when Alberta's Barry Kennedy failed to appear for his heat in the 100 freestyle.

Under the rules, he was disqualified from the meet and Alberta consequently lost all 56 points he had previously helped to accumulate.

Adams rubbed it in to the dispirited Alberta team by winning the race in a record 46.8 and Wilkin added second place in 49.91 as Alberta slowly sank from sight and may eventually have lost even third place. Due to the disqualifications and resulting confusion, the final point totals are not yet available. Unofficially, Blues beat Waterloo by at least 200 points with Alberta battling UBC for third.

With the team title assured, Blues suffered a slight letdown when Kasgell won the 500 free as Guinness came third and Jay Steele fourth. Zvi Eldar's hopes for the 200 fly were ruined by a badly cut hand and he finished tenth. Bill Chisholm took fifth behind Alberta's John Starratt. Vanular swam a solid 56.6 for a silver medal in the 100 back and Farquhar finished a solid sixth.

Sebben narrowly missed another record in the 100 breastroke but Rottman and Aho also made the final to add more points to Varsity's now runaway lead. Rottman swam a lifetime best of 2:20.73.

Temple was third and Alex Lau ninth in the three-metre diving before the veterans wrapped things up by establishing a record 3:13.7 in the 400 freestyle.

Russ Farquhar had 49.8 in another gritty display for the former backstroke specialist volunteered to become a sprinter this year to help the team's overall performance.

Dave Wilkin atoned for his earlier bunder with 48.7. Then the two veterans, Adams and Guinness, locked up the race in their final intercollegiate appearances. Guinness went 48.7 and Adams added 46.6.

In the women's section of a successful co-ed meet, Jane Wright led the Tarpons with her two IM records and a good second place race of 2:16.69 in the 200 backstroke.

Nancy Thomson placed fourth in the 100 back, Joy Stratten was fifth in the 200 free and ninth in the 100 fly, and Shirley Schmidt grabbed eleventh in both the 200 and 400 freestyles.

Wright, Thomson, Stratten and Schmidt combined for fourth place in the 400 medley relay and a team of Starten, Wright, Schmidt and Marilyn McCormack also placed fourth in the 400 freestyle.

At the conclusion of the meet, Varsity swimming captain Jim Adams and British Columbia swimmer George Smith were named co-winners of the CIAU swimmer of the year award.

Track team wins

By JOHN SHAYS
and BRAD MORLEY

Sparked by a national intercollegiate record of 3:19.9 in the 4x400 M relay first event, the U of T's 21 man indoor track team went on to win the Ontario University championships at the CNE on Saturday with 146 points over Western in second with 90 points. The old record was 119.5 points.

Toronto dominated the field events with a one, two three sweep in the triple jump, a two, three, four sweep in the high jump and a one, two sweep in the pole vault. Of the total 146 points, 80 came from the field events.

Frank Aquano, Dave Howes, Dave Colbert and Gerry Feeeney made up the 4x400 M relay team. The other first place finishes for Toronto came with Ran Nastuk's pole vault, Dave Watt in the triple jump, and the distance medley of Rick Cunningham, Aquano, Mike Dyer and Joe Sax.

This team finished with a new OUAAs record of 10:11.0 breaking the old one of 10:23.4 quite handily.

Sax ran a 4:10 mile in the anchor leg to bring the team from behind.

The other records of the meet came from Harvey Barkauskas of Western in the shot put with a throw of 15.49 meters, a national collegiate record, and in the 5000m with York's Ken Hamilton finishing with a time of 14:21.0.

Toronto's John Shays ran a very close second to finish in 14:22.4. Both were under the old OUAAs record.

Department of Mining and Metallurgical Engineering Liquid Metal and Casting Research

Graduate programs leading to the degrees of M. Eng. or Ph.D. are available in the areas of liquid metal processing and casting. Research in these areas is centered mainly on a new vacuum melting and casting installation. This unit is capable of processing 50 to 300 lbs. of molten metal under vacuums of 20 microns. Associated with the unit is a parallel air melting facility. The entire installation is the largest of its kind in a Canadian University, and is supported by analytical and metallographic facilities as well as an electron microprobe and electron microscopes.

Areas of current or future research interest include:

- alloy development
- vacuum purification of both ferrous and non ferrous metals
- melting phenomena of solid alloy additions to liquid metals
- fading phenomena of inoculants in cast iron
- desulphurization of pig iron
- the behaviour of inclusions in liquid metals.

Generous scholarships are available to all candidates who are accepted. Enquiries and applications should be addressed to either:

Waterloo Warriors capture OUAA

Western upsets Blues 6-4

By PAUL CARSON

Western Mustangs were the giant-killers but in the end Waterloo Warriors reaped the rewards in the OUAA hockey championships Friday and Saturday at the Arena.

Mustangs ended the Blues eight-year reign as league champions with a stunning 6-4 upset victory in Friday night's opening game. It was the first time Varsity coach Tom Watt has failed to win the Queen's Cup, and the loss ended Blues' hopes for a sixth consecutive CIAU title.

Waterloo out-gunned York Yeomen 8-4 in the other semi-final and then held off a desperate Western rally in the final period of Saturday's championship game to win their first OUAA final 6-4.

Warriors now host University of Calgary Dinosaurs in a best two-of-three semi-final leading to the CIAU championship March 16 at Varsity Arena.

The second-guessing, of course, occupied most of the weekend as Varsity players, fans, pro scouts and even referees offered their comments and definitive, if conflicting, post-game analyses.

Blues are the only hockey team in the world with two second-string goaltenders, one scout said.

"If Varsity had solid goaltending, they'd be untouchable," added referee Jim Lever.

Such comments suggest the blame falls on netminder Jim Campbell, who in truth had an off-night and was wobbly on some of the Western goals. However, hockey is a team game and the entire team must share the criticism.

Blues piled up an incredible 59-17 advantage in shots on goal but Mustang goalie Chris Cathcart came up with what he later called "the game of my life."

Cathcart was good, in fact very good, but he was also lucky, as winners often are. Blues missed passes, shot wide of open nets, and on at least three occasions saw certain goals deflect off the goalposts.

Defensively, Western forechecked Varsity relentlessly and capitalized on every opportunity, especially in the second period when Mustangs scored three goals on only four shots.

Attempting to explain away the defeat does not do adequate credit to the excellent game plan prepared by Western coach, Ron Watson, whose players effectively exploited every Varsity weakness and certainly deserved the victory.

The game began cautiously as both teams concentrated on establishing checking patterns and Blues piled up a noticeable territorial advantage but missed several good scoring chances.

Western's Dan Smith opened the scoring at 17:46, picking up a rebound as the Varsity defense covered the wrong player in front of the net.

All-star winger Dave Edwards made it 2-0 early in the second period finishing off a quick two-on-one break that started when Chuck Luksa handed the puck to Gary Coons at the Western blue line.

Bill Hews brought the Varsity players and fans to life at 7:11 with a good goal culminating a sustained attack but 33 seconds later the Blues' defence handed the goal right back as Rick Schurr converted a stray pass right in front of Campbell who had no chance.

Edwards added his second goal 40 seconds later and when Campbell misplayed a long shot by Steve Gellinas early in the third period, most fans thought the matter was settled.

However, three goals within less than two minutes midway through the final period cut the lead to 5-4 and suddenly Blues had a chance. Several excellent chances, as it turned out, but a combination of Cathcart and wild shooting ruined the many opportunities.

Ron Harris tipped in a pass from Doug Herridge at 5:47 and fourteen seconds later Herridge fed Ivan McFarlane, Blues most consistent player in the game, who circled the net and fooled Cathcart with a low slider.

Kent Ruhnke finally converted a scoring chance with a well-placed wrist shot on a powerplay at 7:32.

Blues continued to press but Coons collected the insurance goal at

The Varsity—Brian Pei

Western's Chris Cathcart stops Don Pagnutti in the third period with the Blues trailing 5-4.

14:27, a somewhat soft effort on a rebound that should have been cleared.

And that is pretty much the story of the game, too much Cathcart and too many things that should have been done but weren't.

Unfortunately for Western Cathcart was very ordinary in the championship game as Waterloo rushed into a 5-0 lead by 5:40 of the second period and appeared headed for a complete rout.

Western struck back with one goal by Schurr before the period ended and two more by Edwards in the opening 42 seconds of the final period.

A few minutes later it was 5-4 when Schurr was credited with a goal after a Waterloo defenceman inadvertently knocked the puck into his own net.

History then repeated itself as Waterloo netminder Jake Dupuis robbed Schurr and Edwards of good scoring chances before Cam Crosby insured the victory with a goal into an empty Western net at 19:36. Warriors had a 35-27 edge in shots.

It was Waterloo's first title after several fruitless years of chasing Varsity in the late sixties. Western division teams have won only one other hockey title, that by McMaster in 1962-63.

Ironically, when Blues last lost the Queen's Cup in 1964-65, it was via a 6-4 loss in a semi-final game at the Arena to Queens, who played a close checking game and benefitted from outstanding goaltending.

In the two games, Waterloo got no less than nine of their four 14 goals from one line centered by captain Mike Guimond between wingers Ron Hawkshaw and Russ Elliott.

Hawkshaw and Guimond each scored twice against Western while Hawkshaw had a hat trick and Elliott two goals against York with Guimond collecting four assists.

Yeomen grabbed an early 1-0 lead but then fell apart and even a change in goaltenders didn't help. Waterloo led 6-4 after two periods and clinched the game on two more goals within five seconds early in the third.

Attendance for the three games averaged about 2,500 but of course with Blues on the sidelines the final didn't generate the expected interest.

Ski Blues end season with first and last win

The final race of the intercollegiate ski season, the Guelph invitational, was held last Friday at Georgian Peaks Ski Resorts.

The U of T Ski Blues were in third place in overall standings going into the race and had no possibility of improving or losing their position.

Doug Carter, this year's captain, let the team know that there was nothing to lose by "pulling out all the stops" and going for the win.

The strategy seemed to work as the Blues walked away with their first and only win of the season, after placing a consistent second and third in most of the other meets.

A strong third place finish by Britt Roberts, surprising not only himself but the rest of the team, lead the U of T finishers.

Carter placed a respectable fifth and Curtis Eastmure, in the final race of his university career, placed 12th.

Allan Abbott and Paul Leitch were 14th and 18th. Mike Bulger, usually a strong finisher, had problems on his first run and finished well back.

The extremely fast course, which was run on hard snow (ice to most people) made for some spectacular falls and interesting watching. The university circuit, which is getting better each year, had some of the best competitive skiing in Ontario at this meet.

First place in the men's division went to Doug Hamilton of McMaster and in second place was Dave Grieron of Waterloo.

The women's trophy went to Carleton. Joanne Clifford, following in her sister's footsteps, took the women's honors.

Kari Lie of Trent was second and Jennifer Birkett of Carleton was third.

Since this was the last race of the season, the Molson's awards for the series champions were presented following the competition.

After a tight race between Queen's and Carleton all season, Queen's managed to depose Carleton, last year's winners, to take the honors as the best team on the circuit.

Not to be outdone, Carleton's Art Byrd took the men's individual award as a result of his strong finishes throughout the season.

Toronto finished third, a long way ahead of fourth place York. Carter, last year's individual champion, came fifth.

In the women's division, the University of Waterloo finished ahead of Carleton and Queen's. The individual women's honors went to Kari Lie of Trent.

Bill Beck coached the Ski Blues. With so many keen skiers now involved in the team's training program, the Blues should be a strong contender in the overall championships next year.

Social work boycott 'successful'

Classes stood empty at the Social Work Faculty yesterday and Monday . . .

The Varsity—John Penati

. . . while students ran their own show down the street at OISE.

By MARILYN EMERSON

Students at the Faculty of Social Work return to classes today after a two-day boycott of classes in an effort to achieve parity.

Students on the "information line" formed outside the Social Work building reported the boycott was successful. They estimated 75 per cent of the 200-member student body stayed away from classes Monday and Tuesday.

But students, all of whom are in Masters degree programs, will have no indication until Friday whether they won their parity demands.

The boycott was called for by the student union a week ago "to allow the faculty time to reach consensus on the agreements reached thus far by the (teaching and student) negotiating teams."

The student union called off negotiations with faculty last week. The had not received what they considered a satisfactory written reply to their demands.

Faculty were being too slow in responding to negotiations, students said.

The student union felt the boycott was the only effective method to gain recognition and to speed up process to get action on their demands.

On Thursday a faculty meeting decided the whole teaching faculty would break into six groups, each group to discuss one student union demand.

Since then these faculty groups have been engaged in meetings.

Faculty will come together at tomorrow's meeting to discuss the results of those meetings and will not break until they have reached agreement on each of the six student demands.

Faculty intend to present their decisions to the student union on Friday. There is no indication whether the faculty will grant parity.

At the student union meeting held yesterday at OISE students moved to return to classes and await the faculty's response to their demands.

The union will act on that response at next Tuesday's student meeting.

Regarding admissions of new students, the student meeting moved that:

"A parity admissions committee be created to formulate and implement policies for admissions to the faculty for the academic year 1975-76.

"Parity participation must be involved in the acceptance or rejection of each application for admission.

"Decisions of the admissions committee must be ratified by both the faculty and student constituencies."

Regarding their demand for a parity faculty council students moves "that a committee be established to develop a proposal for a Faculty Council.

"This committee should deal with issues not dealt with by the former commission on faculty structure (1972) including those of the dean's accountability and of council composition.

"The committee will be a parity committee of four students and four representatives of teaching faculty and field instructors, and is free to invite participation via briefs and attendance from other interested bodies.

"The committee will complete its work by August 15 and present its decisions to the student union and to the teaching faculty in September."

The other four demands are: restructuring of the values class; more flexibility in courses; student records to be open to inspection by individual students on request; no staffing or tenure decisions to be made until there is student parity on all committees making these decisions.

It was denied by some of the students at the meeting that the student union negotiating committee could assume that students staying away demonstrated support of the boycott.

Assistant Dean W.W. Bourke said on principle he would not cross a picket line of organized labor.

However, he added he felt "the responsibility of teachers was in the classroom."

Hence, teaching staff, as well as conducting meetings to discuss student demands, were also available for class on Monday and Tuesday.

Bourke said one half of his students showed up for class.

Dean Albert Rose was not at the Faculty of Social Work on Monday. Some students interpreted this as an action of good intent on his part.

However, Dean Rose was in Ann Arbor, Michigan, on Monday giving a paper.

While the boycott was in operation students organized classes to be held in OISE.

Bourke asked: "How do you rationalize a boycott when you hold classes down the street?"

Bourke said some of the teaching staff had been approached and asked to participate in these classes.

Students said the classes were student-run and professors' names appeared beside course numbers merely to identify classes.

Bourke argued it is not true that students have no say on decision making bodies.

Prior to removing themselves from the policy committees the students had parity status.

Moreover, Bourke contended these committees had decision making power. He said policies were formulated and voted upon at this level by all members.

He added that parity groups worked toward the present structure which is only one-and-a-half-years-old. Bourke feels this structure has not been worked at enough to prove its real value.

Bourke said the present structure constitutes a "lateral distribution of authority" and added he anticipated problems in the beginning.

Students uniformly complain that their input on these committees was not given sufficient recognition. They claim decisions were made independently by the administration.

Students say that those decisions—some regarding admissions, reading week, and evaluation—were policy decisions not administrative decision, and as such they should have received ratification at the committee level.

Bourke admitted decisions had been made independent of the committees, but added this was because decision-making was "too slow" in the existing committees which resulted in "endless discussion" which Bourke said was a "waste of time."

Students contended dean Rose was accountable only to Simcoe Hall and while other structures within the faculty had changed, the authority of the dean has remained unaltered.

Students acknowledge their parity input on committees but contend the committees have not power of implementation.

Students say the argument that "committees bog down" is merely used as an excuse by faculty to pass independent policy decisions.

One student claimed the committees were ineffective because their "terms of reference were never clearly defined and that," he said, "is the fault of the people who set them up."

The student union first struck a negotiating committee February 5 "to begin open negotiations" on their six demands of January 30th.

They requested that time a written reply from the faculty including responses to each of the six demands.

On February 8 the faculty appointed a committee of nine members to meet with the negotiating committee had decision-union.

It was agreed by both faculty and student bodies that neither negotiating committee had decisions making power but would report back to their constituencies positions taken at negotiating meetings.

Those positions were to be either rejected or ratified at larger separate meetings of the faculty and student union bodies.

GAA applies for certification as first TA union in Canada

After months of organizing the Graduate Assistants Association (GAA) applied Monday for certification as the bargaining agent for more than 2,000 teaching assistants (TA's) at U of T.

If successful, the GAA will become the first union in Canada representing TA's.

"Our application is further evidence that Canadian teachers are workers who can no longer live in an ivory tower," said GAA president Michael O'Keefe.

The GAA has already applied for certification of 40 TA's at Victoria University as separate bargaining unit from the main campus.

A meeting is possible next week to consider the GAA's request for a pre-hearing vote on certification of the main campus unit.

If approved, a pre-hearing vote could take place in early April.

The vote would be among TA's asking them whether they wished the GAA to represent them and vote of 50 per cent plus one would be required for certification.

However, the ballots from the vote would not be counted until after the certification hearing before the Ontario Labor Relations Board.

One of the first tasks the board will have is to decide how many TA's should be in the unit.

With between 850 and 900 TA's signed up, the GAA is claiming a unit of about 2,100 persons.

However the university is citing a number nearer 2,400. The difference is in the definition of who is a TA.

Apparently the university is claiming about 200 doctors and dentists who do teaching work but are not professors are TA's.

The labor board will ultimately have to make a ruling on the definition where the university and the GAA cannot agree.

The six-month recruiting drive by the GAA ended on a high note last week when at least 60 TA's signed up following publicity that the GAA had won back vacation pay for assistants going back to the 1971-72 academic year.

That pushed them over the top with signatures to spare for an application which requires at least 35 per cent of the potential bargaining unit signed up.

Based on a complex formula, TA's could receive anywhere from $30 to $150 in back vacation pay providing they apply for past years themselves.

The vacation pay issue may cost U of T $180,000 if all eligible TA's apply.

O'Keefe said assistants employed by the federated colleges should also be getting the back vacation pay.

So far there do not seem to have been major problems in getting the back pay, O'Keefe said.

Non-academic discipline code approved by internal... ..and academic affairs

President Evans listened attentively at academic affairs yesterday, until it was SAC's turn to present the student point of view. Then he fell asleep.

By DICK BROWN

The academic section of the discipline code was approved for implementation by the internal affairs committee of Governing Council, on Monday, the committee which helped create the code a year ago.

However the committee specifically did not approve implementation of the non-academic section of the code.

The committee's recommendations now go to Tuesday's closed door meeting of the executive committee, where virtually automatic approval is expected, and then on to Governing Council March 28 when approval is likely.

Monday's vote by internal affairs lays the groundwork for the academic section of the code to come into effect possibly by the end of the month depending on the Governing Council vote.

Internal affairs did not set a date for implementation of the academic code. Presumably this would be done by Governing Council on March 28 or at the in camera executive meeting next week.

Governing Council voted in January not to implement the non-academic section of the code before January, 1975, if by March "substantial progress" had been reached between students and administration on other sections of the code.

Internal affairs chairwoman Marnie Paikin repeatedly reminded her committee approval Monday of the academic section would in all likelihood result in Governing Council not touching the non-academic section for a year.

It was clear she and internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway viewed committee approval of the academic code as "substantial progress."

Only the three student members of the committee voted against approving the academic section of the code.

The vote by internal was the culmination of February discussions between SAC and the administration over the code.

The five discussion meetings ended February 26 with no agreement on the non-academic code but SAC agreeing to the administration's academic code provided amendments to the document be made.

Effectively those positions were what passed internal affairs.

Both the academic and non-academic sections of the code were approved in principle by Governing Council last year. The current debate centres around bringing the code into effect.

By the end of Monday's meeting the non-academic section of the code had been effectively suspended, although had not Conway re-worded part of the motion the non-academic code might have been repealed.

The original motion before the committee for the academic code was provided by the university's legal consultants, Cassels, Brock and Wednesday.

That draft motion provided for passage of the academic code but called for "deleting" the non-academic code from recommendations to go to Governing Council.

Such a wording boils down to a repeal of the non-academic code.

However at the beginning of the meeting Conway immediately proposed a lengthy amendment to the draft proposal which brought the non-academic code back into the fold but suspended it from taking effect.

It took about 45 minutes of confused discussion for the committee to realize what was happening and after a series of procedural wrangles, faculty and government members voted for Conway's amendment.

By BOB GAUTHIER

The academic section of the discipline code was approved for implementation by the academic affairs committee of Governing Council yesterday, the other committee which helped create the code a year ago.

However, the committee specifically did not approve implementation of the non-academic section of the code.

The committee's recommendations now go to Tuesday's closed door meeting of the executive committee where virtually automatic approval is expected, and then on to Governing Council March 28 when approval is likely.

Tuesday's vote by academic affairs lays the groundwork for the academic section of the code to come into effect possibly by the end of the month, depending on the Governing Council vote.

Academic affairs did not set a date for implementation of the academic code. Presumably this would be done by Governing Council on March 28 or at the in camera executive meeting next week.

Academic affairs chairman Jack Dove felt it was not necessary to "go through the internal affairs resolutions (from Monday) in detail." He said the committee might agree that "approved by internal now be put into operation."

The most controversial item concerned evaluation of course work submitted late to a member of the teaching faculty. A proposed amendment sought to ensure that "failure to perform or submit work within the time or in the manner required" would be taken into account in the evaluation of the work.

Arts and science associate dean Joan Foley said "it has to be agreed that there's one date or deadline given" for a piece of work. If the person doesn't bring the piece of work in until the following academic session she said, that student should receive a mark of zero.

Foley said many departments and courses use a "graduation of the grade" where late work "is still acceptable but with a reduced credit" for that piece of work. She claimed the amendment would involve a question of "equity"...it can be unfair to students who have submitted on time."

The faculty of Arts and Science has "no guidelines now", Foley said. "It's an arbitrary decision now." She recommended the code stand as it was in this particular case and where a piece of work was late an explanation should be given.

An arts and science student, she said, could submit a petition giving the reasons for the late piece of work.

However, under present conditions, the same offence results in different penalties in different departments.

"After considerable discussion consensus was reached on the amendment" although an amendment was added that the right of a department or division to assign penalties would not be limited."

The noteworthy "conspiracy" clause was also deleted from the forthcoming code.

The original section of the code read: "Every member is a party to an offence under this Code who abets, counsels, procures or conspires with another member to commit or be a party to the offence; or abets, counsels, procures or conspires with any other person who, if that person were a member, would have committed or been a party to that offence."

Under heavy student pressure the committee agreed to drop the words "counsel" and "conspire." University lawyer Don Guthrie agreed with the students, saying he didn't think it was a serious charge.

The committee also approved a third amendment allowing the jury instead of the chairman or hearing officer to "determine and impose the appropriate sanction" by a majority of its members where a member has been convicted. (Internal affairs also passed this amendment Monday.)

A further amendment passed at academic (in line with internal's decision Monday) after a compromise to both the student and administration's positions was brought forward.

The new amendment provides that, when a majority of the jury is unable to reach agreement as to the penalty to be imposed, the most severe sanction which the chairman or the hearing officer may impose is that agreed to by a majority of the members of the jury when originally polled.

SAC president Bob Anderson said he was "worried about one person determining and imposing the appropriate sanction. One person can't embody the university community."

Anderson said the only fair and legal way to impose the sanction and to get a decision that would involve the university as a whole would be as a group. "Given that a tribunal was set up to reflect this, Anderson felt a single person couldn't adequately fit the requirements."

Anderson also attempted to have the committee introduce an amendment to establish the maximum penalties for any one piece of work for a student caught cheating or plagiarizing.

He said the maximum penalty should be zero "on that particular piece of work. He also objected to the faculty having the right change the marking scheme at any time during the year."

Associate dean Foley said changes in marking scheme arise from "thoughtlessness or ignorance" on the part of the instructor. She hoped these could be accommodated by guidelines for instructors. "What would be appropriate in our case may not be appropriate for other faculties," she said.

University president John Evans commented he wanted to see changes made at the faculty-divisional level, not through academic affairs.

Anderson replied "he didn't share the president's confidence" in that channel for reform, and said "that solution is unsatisfactory."

Nevertheless, chairman Dove shunted Anderson's request off to the academic appeals committee for further discussion. (Nothing has ever come back from the academic appeals committee alive.)

Law students' brief rejects non-academic discipline code

By DAVID SIMMONDS

A committee of the Students' Law Society at U of T has called for the rejection of the non-academic section of the proposed code of behavior (the discipline code) and the adoption of a "much restricted code of non-academic offenses."

A brief from the society to the Governing Council, February 27, calls section D of the code (which deals with non-academic offenses) "unacceptable in view of the sweeping jurisdiction it confers."

Governing Council is to meet March 28 to discuss the discipline code.

The internal affairs committee of the council voted Monday not to implement the non-academic portion of the code, and to implement the academic section.

"There already exist the means to control unacceptable campus protest activities," the law students' report states.

The report says sanctions proposed in the code as punishment "are never justified for conduct properly dealt with by the courts.

"The narrowness of circumstances for which the university requires penalties for 'non-academic' misconduct does not justify the introduction of any general, university-wide system of non-academic behaviour."

The report recommends the Governing Council establish a disciplinary tribunal for academic offences at its March meeting, but table indefinitely the section on non-academic offenses.

"The students of the Faculty of Law are most willing to assist in the drafting of a new non-academic code" the report concludes.

The brief is also concerned with the effects of the academic sections of the code.

"We think it proper for the university to have authority to penalize academic misconduct," for "the university has sound reasons for enacting a code of academic conduct."

The brief states the main purpose of the academic section of the code is to "preserve the reliability of the university's certification function."

Academic misconduct can already be dealt with under present authority, the report states, but the enforcement system is unfair.

The brief supports the adoption of the section of the code dealing with academic misconduct, and the proposal for academic tribunals.

Elections in Arts and Science inspire apathy

The election for Arts and Science general committee has almost been cancelled because of apathy. With the exception of three faculty positions there are no elections for seats on the 200 member governing body.

The lack of interest was so overwhelming on the student side. Only 27 students filed nomination papers for the 49 student seats. Three will be 22 vacancies. Some of the students from this year will be returning.

The low number of candidates may be due to the heavily faculty dominated nature of the committee. Students lost an attempt to get parity two years ago.

Elected among the students were D. F. Vickers (UC), Bob Bettson (Innis), F. E. Wagner, J. C. Demaray (Humanities), Glicksman and R. Lennox (Physical Sciences), M.J. Sabia and J. Rohr (Social Sciences), C.O. Bull (Woodsworth), and M.D. MacDonald (Committee on Study Elsewhere).

Among faculty notables acclaimed were A.P. Thornton (History), Peter Silcox (Political Science), M.J. Hare (Erindale), L.E.H. Trainor (Physics) and a number of others.

By-elections will be held for vacant seats in the fall said Assistant dean Bill Foulds.

Not many students want a Council seat

Now going into its third season with no reruns but many rereads the Governing Council Show is holding its "elections" by mailed ballot from March 4 to March 13.

Three undergraduate candidates are vying for a position in next year's limelight in full-time undergraduate constituency I. (All students registered in the Faculty of Arts and Science including Erindale College and Scarborough College.)

By far the most politically experienced candidate in this constituency is Political Economy Course Union chairman Howard Stein.

Alone of the three candidates in this constituency Stein takes a progressive position on almost all issues. For example, he wants to see: "more stress on quality teaching, parity at all levels, operational agreement in the classroom, a committee to investigate racism and sexism in the university, university financed day care, the discipline code repealed, and financial barriers to higher education removed."

Although Stein is unlikely to sway the 42 (of 50) non-student members of the Governing Council to his views, he is the strongest possible contender to represent the interests of students on next year's Council.

The other two candidates seeking a seat in this constituency—Peter Jarrett and Shirley French—are not as well known as Stein for their political activity and defence of students' rights on this campus.

Jarrett, by his own admission, only decided to run for Governing Council after his experiences with faculty and administration in the French course union. His experience is limited, but he is slightly progressive on some issues.

Unfortunately he takes the SAC position on discipline—no non-academic code, but a willingness to accept an academic code. Jarrett also feels students "have to deserve" parity before they can get it.

Shirley French has no political background she could speak about in our interviews with her, but she does want to see student parity at all levels of decision-making. However, she is unsure of whether students should have protection against academic wrongs, but rejects the Conway-Cadario Code anyway. French stresses "experimental programs" in her campaign.

Steve Moses and Terry Ruddy, two medical students, are competing for one seat in undergraduate constituency II—the professional faculties constituency.

Moses, one of SAC's two vice-presidents this year, is essentially parroting the SAC line. He is opposed to the Conway-Cadario code "in the present state", but claims he could live with an academic code if major changes were to be made.

Moses is, unfortunately, more liberal than some other student candidates with respect to the parity question. He feels students should have representation first so faculty and administration can see students performing a constructive role in, for example, staffing decisions. Moses calls this "significant student representation".

Having served on numerous committees on many areas of the university governing structure Moses would bring a wealth of experience with him to Governing Council.

The other student candidate in constituency II—Terry Ruddy—although more progressive than Moses when we interviewed him, does not have any university political experience we know of.

Although he opposes the present "condescending" attitude of the administration toward students, his views on parity are unclear. He claims to want students to have the majority say in deciding tenure on the basis of teaching, yet faculty will decide who will get tenure on the basis of research.

However, Ruddy says that "as research ability would be weighted less than teaching ability, this contribution (assessment) by the professors to the decision of granting tenure would be less than that of the students. Does he mean students are to have a greater influence than faculty in tenure decisions by virtue of the fact that teaching ability will be weighted more than research ability on a parity committee?"

We don't feel that Ruddy has stated his position very clearly, but then maybe we just have difficulty understanding.

Ruddy's position does seem to be clear with regard to discipline—no negotiations.

Two seats are available in part-time undergraduate constituency I, and incumbent Arlene Dick and challengers Gary Heighington and Bill Whelton are after the seats.

As Scarborough College Student Council vice-president next year Heighington would bring added part-time student depth from a suburban campus onto the Governing Council.

An advocate of student parity with faculty on departmental tenure committees, Heighington is also opposed to the discipline code. He is also strongly in favour of facilities for Woodsworth College, the new college for part-time students, and wants the Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students to remain a group which represents all part-time students.

Incumbent Arlene Dick is trying for yet another term on the Council.

Dick has voiced her opinion rarely at committee meetings and when she says something speaks of purely parochial issues. We do not know what her position is on tenure or the discipline code, two important issues which also affect part-time students.

Bill Whelton, also running for one of the two available seats has served on many committees and is probably the most experienced of the three students running for Council.

Active as a class representative since 1969, Whelton served also as a director, vice-president and president of APUS, as a member of Erindale College and the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

So apparently some students feel the Governing Council is worth serving on, even if students only have eight of 50 seats on the Council and lose every important vote.

Oh well, it's something to put down on your curriculum vitae if you're applying to, say, McMaster Medical School.

Jensen and followers claim IQ actually measures intelligence

Last Wednesday we published two articles discussing racism. The following is the third and last of a series by Bill Wedge and Dennis Higgs on Jensenist theories of race. The article is reprinted from the University of Waterloo student newspaper, the chevron.

Intelligence, according to Arthur Jensen and his followers, may be operationally defined as that quality which is measured by scores on IQ tests. Blacks and other minorities are classified as 'inferior' because of their generally lower test scores. Startling anomalies in the component questions of the tests, however, indicate that the deficiencies, ascribed to minority group subjects are in fact deficiencies in the tests themselves.

The IQ concept is a hoax. The tests are rigged to show what they are used to prove — the alleged inferiority of the poor and minorities.

The arguments of Jensen and others that the poor and minorities are genetically less intelligent consist of three basic points:

- (1) IQ tests measure intelligence;
 - (2) IQ differences among whites are only 20 per cent due to environmental differences;
 - (3) Thus the Black-White IQ difference is probably mainly genetic.
- The last article of this series explained:

- that the 'proof' of (2) consists of four studies showing that White identical twins separated at birth tend to score similarly on IQ tests;

- that this similarity exists because twins are of the same age and sex, and tend to be brought up in similar environments; and that

- (2) is irrelevant to racial differences (3) because Black-White environmental differences are much greater than those found within the white population.

Nevertheless, Blacks, Indians, Mexican Americans, the poor, and working-class people in general tend to score less well on IQ tests. But it does not mean they are less intelligent as a closer look at the subject reveals.

Q. What is the essential difference between "work" and "play"?

High IQ answer: Work is energy used for doing something useful and play is just wasted energy.

Low IQ answer: You'd rather play than work.

(Stanford-Binet)

Theories of innate inferiority existed long before the first IQ test. The 'great' Francis Galton in 1869 published a book, Hereditary Genius, claiming intelligence was inherited and that the British ruling class had more of it than anyone else. But tests devised by Galton and others, measuring for example memory and reaction time, showed that not only were the rich undistinguished (1) but also that Black and Indian children were superior.

(2). The pioneer psychologist E. L. Thorndike summarized the prevailing attitude in 1903 when he rationalized that: "The apparent mental attainments of children of inferior races may be due to lack of inhibition, and so witness precisely to a deficiency in mental growth" (3).

These early attempts were of course discarded as failures, and the honor of coming up with the first IQ test fell to the French psychologist Binet: What is not generally realized is that the Binet test was designed not to measure abstract mental ability but to predict success in school (4). Binet tried out many different types of question, and the criterion for including a question in the final version was whether or not it distinguished those who, in the opinion of the teachers, were likely to do well in school. The Binet test was adapted to the US by Stanford psychologist Terman and so was born the Stanford-Binet (S-B) IQ test, which Jensen classed "one of the great breakthroughs in psychology."

The S-B does, in fact, predict school success fairly well—suspiciously so because one would think that school success demands at least as much on such things as motivation, respect for authority, and class background as on innate mental ability. Even a brief examination of actual IQ test questions confirms the worst of these suspicions. In fact tests like the S-B measure motivation, respect for authority and class background more than any such mental ability.

Q. What is the meaning of "authority"?

High IQ answer: Some high person in authority has some large responsibilities.

Low IQ answer: Always coming in and taking things that don't belong to them.

(Stanford-Binet)

For a start, the S-B is almost completely verbal, and puts great emphasis on vocabulary. All subjects past the age of six are asked to define a certain number of words from a master list of 45. The list includes:

11. scorch 22. tus 37. milksop 41. achromatic 17. peculiarity 26. bewail 38. harpy 43. homunculus 21. disproportionate 36. piscatorial 39. depredation 45. parterre

The words are Standard English as opposed to colloquial, with the emphasis on literature (note the reference to Greek mythology). The only way a child would know a lot of them is by reading a lot on

Q. What's the thing to do if another person hits you without meaning to?

High IQ answer: Tell them it didn't hurt.

Low IQ answer: Hit them back.

(Stanford-Binet)

his own, mainly English literature, or by living in a middle or upper class home where they might be used. Motivation? Yes. Class background? Yes. Intelligence? Hardly. Yet an adult who can define 30 of these words has a seven point lead over an adult who knows only 22 of them.

Of course, vocabulary is only part of the test. At the "Average Adult" level the other sections are: (2) Ingenuity; (3) Differences Between Abstract Words; (4) Arithmetic; (5) Proverbs; (6) Orientation;

(7) Essential Differences; and (8) Abstract words. Some, such as (3) and (8) are just disguised vocabulary. And those tests which do not rely on the knowledge of four dollar words or simple skill are even more slanted towards attitudes and background.

Q. What's the thing to do if you're on your way to school and you notice you're in danger of being late?

High IQ answer: Hurry.

Low IQ answer: Just Keep on going.

(Stanford-Binet)

In some cases the difference between right and wrong seems to depend only on the style of language used, and so must reflect the tester's prejudices. Many implicitly measure attitudes and beliefs; others do so explicitly. For example, in regard to the "late for school" question, the manual states that "only those responses that suggest hurrying are acceptable".

and they were rigged to show minorities to be 'dumb'. For example, before 1937 women scored about 10 points below men on the S-B. When it was restandardized in 1937, this difference was eliminated by adding questions women did better on and removing some that men did better on (9). They could have eliminated racial differences in the same way. They chose not to—the standardization sample for the WISC and the S-B was all white.

Yet these are tests used in most of the Black White studies Jensen cites; these are the tests used in twin studies to 'prove' that IQ is 80 per cent inherited. While some might argue that IQ comparisons between people from similar cultural backgrounds are valid, those who, like Jensen, go on to infer race or class differences in "intelligence" on the basis of scores on the Stanford-Binet are perpetrating a cheap hoax.

Why is it then that such trash is heralded by the media, supported by the government and passed off in classrooms and textbooks as 'science'? Because racism is socially useful. When times get rough, it is more convenient to those in power that while people blame their troubles on the bad genes of inferior races, rather than on the system itself. Eugenics is as American as apple pie. Terman himself was a prominent member of the Council for Race Betterment.

Q. Why do we elect (or need to have) Senators and Congressmen?

High IQ ANSWER: Electing Senators makes government responsible to the people.

Low IQ answer: Senators help control the people in the US.

(WISC)

This organization, founded and funded by the wealthy Harriman and Kellogg families, obtained the passage in the U.S. of laws forbidding interracial marriage and requiring the sterilization of the unfit. This movement died only because of WWII; there is every reason to believe that the spread of Jensen's ideas is signalling its rebirth. Questions of race and prejudice are just as relevant in Canada, with its large immigrant population, as they are in the US. If there is one lesson that can be learned from twentieth century history, it is that racism is a life or death issue.

In closing we return to the discussion of race and IQ in Psychology: Search for Alternatives. Aside from the bias of the articles reprinted, the comments of the editors (Dyal et al) contain numerous errors (p. 230-232). They state that American Blacks score "about 15 points below the average white American or white European". This figure is high, and cannot be extended to Europeans, because they have their own tests, standardized to 100. The editors state that "we do not know" the source of the IQ difference (look at the tests).

They state that "we know" IQ to be 80 per cent heritable for whites. They imply that such figures are relevant in determining the source of racial differences. There is no mention of even a cultural bias in IQ tests. Worst of all, IQ differences are equated with "intellectual differences", differences in "intellectual ability" and in "intellectual functioning". The book will soon go to McGraw-Hill to be published. We hope the section on race and IQ will be completely revised.

So much for the Stanford-Binet, which Jensen calls "the standard of the measurement of intelligence". All subsequent IQ tests have been validated on the basis of high correlations with the S-B. The most important of these other tests is the Wechsler Intelligence Scale for Children (WISC) (5). The WISC is very similar in its make-up to the S-B, including a similar vocabulary list.

What the reader might find hard to understand is that the S-B and WISC are not what one imagines an IQ test to be. Glaringly absent are the abstract-pattern type of question usually associated with IQ. There are, of course, tests relying completely on non-verbal items such as completing an abstract design. The Raven Progressive Matrices test is the most common of these, and Jensen et al make much of the fact that Blacks do poorly on it. However, Black students taking a special SEED new math course score 'normally' on the Raven test (6) which would indicate that what it measures is only a narrow and easily acquired mathematical-type skill.

Why are there so such items on the S-B? As Terman explains "Many of the so-called performance test items tried out for inclusion were eliminated because they contributed little or nothing to the total score. They were not valid items for this scale" (7). In other words, they did not predict school success—they didn't show the right people to be "intelligent".

In short, the tests are frauds. They were rigged to show the rich to be smart;

Profs urge discipline repeal

According to information from student leaders, as reported in the Varsity, February 27, the administration has conceded to the urging of student representative groups (SAC, GSU, APUS), and has agreed to recommend to internal affairs not to implement the non-academic sections on "discipline" of the Conway-Cadario Code at the Governing Council meeting on March 28. As members of a university community, which professes to be based on educational, rather than caretaking, goals, we are encouraged by this report, and we urge internal Affairs to continue in this direction by not implementing these sections either at the next meeting or at any time in the future.

With the law of the land still in force, the non-academic parts of the Code lay students open to double jeopardy. They can be convicted for some act either under the civil laws, or by the university, which consequently would have to take onto itself elements of a policing and judicial system. The consequences of this would be greatly harmful to the academic community, especially to maintaining trusting student/teacher relations which must be at the centre of all meaningful university life.

Moreover, the Conway-Cadario Code is opposed by all three student representative groups: SAC, APUS, GSU, and it was passed in June, 1973, only when students were absent from the campus against the expressed wishes of the groups. This controversial code is without student consent.

For the above-stated reasons, we urge that the non-academic parts of the code be repealed by the Governing Council.

Candidates slams Varsity coverage

I wish to express my indignation both about the misrepresentation of my stand on tenure and at the lack of objectivity shown by the Varsity staff in the article, "Candidates for Governing Council Speak On..." (March 4, 1974). This article was the result of an invitation printed in the Varsity (February 27, 1974), which was as follows — "Student candidates for Governing Council are invited to stop by ye olde Varsity office..." in order to give the Varsity 'reporters' a "chance to talk about the Governing Council election for a feature to appear Monday about student candidates." (Note the emphasis on student candidates!)

The invitation stressed that pictures would also be taken.

This sounded like a very good idea. The university community needs to know who the candidates are and what they represent in order to make a rational choice. The Varsity seemed to be fulfilling this need by supposedly giving all candidates an equal opportunity to express their opinions about the significant issues concerning Governing Council. Therefore, in good faith, I accepted the invitation and expressed my views on the relevant issues and allowed my picture to be taken.

Imagine my dismay upon seeing the promised 'feature' article. At first, I could not find the segment of the article staging my views, nor my picture. Then I noticed the phrase, "continues on page 12", and turning the page, found not a straight forward account of my statements with a picture, but a criticism of my stand on tenure, supposedly spotting a lack of clarity and then suggesting a contradiction in my platform. This was certainly not an objective report, but rather subjective evaluation that was by no means in my favour. If I am to be so criticized I should be given time to defend myself, especially when the criticism is uncalled for, and in this case invalid. Also, why should the platform of one candidate be criticized and not that of the others?

Allow me to clarify my position with respect to tenure. I was correctly quoted as vigorously supporting "student parity in all decisions pertaining to granting of tenure". When interviewed by Varsity 'reporters' I was asked to elaborate upon my views on student parity with respect to tenure. First I made clear that I considered the responsibility to be primarily a teacher and secondarily a researcher. This distribution of responsibilities should be taken into consideration when granting tenure to a professor; that is, the majority of the decision should be based on teaching ability. Since the students are in the best position to evaluate teaching ability, student opinion should carry the most weight. This would give student opinion the greatest overall say in such decisions. This weight can only be achieved by student parity. With this in mind, I suggested that the evaluation of research ability should rest primarily with the professors due to their greater knowledge of research material. As research ability would be weighted less than teaching ability, this contribution by the professors to the decision of granting of tenure would be less than that of the students. It was this last statement concerning the contribution of professors that the Varsity printed out of context. The Varsity wrongly attempted to suggest that a lack of student parity in the evaluation of research ability was in contradiction with student parity in the final decision of granting tenure. I see no contradiction.

The emphasis placed by the Varsity on this supposed lack of clarity in my views on tenure and the little attention paid to the positive aspects of my platform raises serious doubts in my mind as to the objectivity of the Varsity staff. Other circumstances reinforce these doubts.

When I was interviewed, pictures were taken to be printed with my statements. However, my picture did not appear, whereas those of the other candidates did (with the exception of one candidate who did not submit a picture). When I called the Varsity office for an explanation, I was told that the negatives had been lost. This may be possible. However, I do not see why no attempt was made to obtain another photograph or negative. Furthermore, I see no need for the appearance of my statements in a position so unobtrusive. When I asked the Varsity why my statements were not on the same pages as those of the other candidates but included more as an 'afterthought' at the end of the article, I was told that advertising did not permit space. Moreover, I question why a non-student, running for an administrative position was given space in an article, supposedly written to report the views of student candidates, when I was denied that space. I wonder about the lack of a headline comparable to that of the other candidates. Why simply my name and not a more meaningful phrase such as, 'Ruddy opposes discipline code'? Perhaps the Varsity staff fails to realize the influence it has on the university community, and thus the influence that favorable and unfavorable exposure has on the outcome of an election. Or perhaps the Varsity staff does realize its impact and is exploiting such an influence!

Terry Ruddy,
Candidate for Governing Council

(Ed. If we made a mistake in our interview with Ruddy, then we would like to apologize. However, we discerned a contradiction in his position—no other candidate appeared to contradict him/herself.

Perhaps we should have placed candidates in alphabetical order on the pages, but even then Ruddy would have spilled over onto page 12.

Ruddy's contradiction seemed so apparent at the time of his interview that we felt obliged to point that out—factually, not "subjectively" or "editorially". There's a difference.

We do apologize for losing Ruddy's picture—it was not intentional and was probably the second picture we have lost this year. We searched for the negatives on production night but couldn't find them and it was too late to have another picture taken. Other candidates—Gary Heighington, for example—sent in their own photographs. And Steve Moses' picture didn't turn out at all when we developed it, so we used an old SAC meeting picture. We were not out to get Terry Ruddy or push him into the background as an 'afterthought'. If he would like to come to our offices we'll try, once again, to take his picture and put it in the paper.)

Varg manipulates Gov Council election coverage

The subtle bias of this newspaper has in the past been at the most bearable, however, it has absolutely overstepped its limits in its manipulation of the election for Governing Council. Although the Varsity has proven its blatant disrespect for almost every social convention, why can it not allow the free electoral process to pass unscathed?

On Monday last your paper ran a page spread presenting all the candidates for Governing Council—almost. My candidate was not on that page—where was he? Where was he! He was relegated to a remote corner of his own. Terry Ruddy, a candidate for constituency II, was deemed not even worthy of a picture.

All other candidates were presented in wide columned print but Terry was reduced to a column half the size—the size of the normal article in the Varsity—and how many people read the usual articles in the Varsity? So the odds have it that Terry's column was overlooked by the majority of students who even took the time to read the spread presenting the other candidates.

The sad thing about the situation was that there was plenty of room on the same page for Terry's column. Alas, he was displaced by a Chinese food advertisement!

Equal representation in the Varsity is essential, since it is the only frequently-read paper on campus. It therefore exerts a good deal of influence on the upcoming elections.

Admittedly, the damage is complete and irreparable, but I am submitting this letter in the hope that future issues of the Varsity will exhibit less bias and more respect for students and their rights to full and equal representation.

APUS urged to continue role, not change

We understand that the Association for Part-time University Students (APUS) may significantly alter its role within the university. As president-elect and vice-president of the Scarborough College Students' Council, we urge APUS to continue its role as a student organization representing all part-time students on the three campuses of the University of Toronto. It is not possible for any individual college student council at the U of T to represent all part-time students. Diversity of academic interest and geographic division prevent part-time students from participating solely in the activities of any individual college.

We will propose that the 1974-75 SCSC and APUS work together to promote social evenings for part-time students in individual disciplines to encourage a greater rapport between students, students' councils, and members of the faculty.

We believe that the SCSC and APUS must work together on matters of concern to part-time students, such as ensuring that there is an adequate supply of texts in the Scarborough College bookstore and reducing the exorbitant parking rates charged part-time students at Scarborough. At a time when course evaluations are becoming a controversial issue at the college, we hope to make use of the valuable experience APUS has amassed in this field so that part-time students will have access to all the available critical information when choosing their courses.

In short, we believe APUS should continue to play an active role in the life of the university and we look forward to co-operating with the 1974-75 APUS executive and class representatives on matters of mutual interest.

No such thing as 'extension' any more

If the Varsity was somewhat better informed on U of T matters, perhaps it would not have printed the gross error in the February 13 issue relating to Woodworth College (page 1, "A & S will adopt credit system"). Please note that there is no longer such a thing as an "extension student" at the University of Toronto. Woodworth College was set up to meet the needs of part-time undergraduate students—we are now an integral part of this University, not an extension of it.

Injunction sought against health board

Canada Metals ordered to produce evidence

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Two Toronto companies were given until April 1 to either file an affidavit or supply evidence against three members of the city board of health, in a hearing held Monday.

Canada Metal Co. Ltd. and Toronto Refiners and Smelters Ltd. are seeking an injunction to prevent the board from dealing with any matters concerning the operations of Canada Metals.

Ward II Alderman Anne Johnston, Ward 6 alderman Dan Heap, and Dr. David Parkinson, were specified in the injunction.

The application asks the board be prevented "from dealing with or disposing of or taking any steps or proceedings pertaining to or doing any act pertaining to or adjudicating on...any matter touching the operation of Canada Metals."

An interim injunction was not granted at Monday's hearing, although another hearing has been set for April 16, provided the evidence is filed by April 1.

Had an interim injunction been granted, the board would have been prevented from touching the subject of Canada Metals, despite the fact that the board is responsible for the health of city residents, and has the power to take steps to alleviate health hazards.

Canada Metals is also attempting to jail three employees of the CBC involved in the radio program "Dying of Lead", which sparked the initial action by the company.

The CBC received the injunction minutes before the program was broadcast, January 29.

Despite on-air deletions, the company proceeded with charges of contempt of court, and is seeking commitment of the CBC employees.

Canada Metals is also seeking to commit two employees of the Globe and Mail, which covered the story on the injunction served to the CBC.

Gary Perly, chairman of the Canadian Liberation Movement, was also served with an injunction after the group distributed leaflets about the company in the neighbourhood of the plant.

However, in court the move by Canada Metals and Toronto Refiners was termed a "grudge match" with the news media, said a lawyer for the CBC, Ian Scott.

Scott said the move by the companies to jail the media people was an abuse of the process of the courts.

So far the hearing to have the five jailed for the alleged violation of the January 29 injunction has proceeded through the companies' legal arguments and part of the defence arguments.

Still to be settled are two other court battles involving the parties to the first case.

The first case is a $14 million libel suit the companies have lodged against the Globe and Mail and the CBC.

The other court case involves an appeal from an Ontario Supreme Court ruling quashing the January 29 injunction.

So far the courts have issued another interim injunction prohibiting publication or broadcast of CBC's allegations about the companies until the courts decide whether or not the two lead companies can appeal the quashing of the first injunction.

Alderman Dan Heap would be silenced by Canada Metals injunction.

No goodies for students in throne speech

By BOB BETTSON

Ontario Premier Bill Davis didn't include any goodies for students in his speech from the throne yesterday to start the new session of the legislature.

The premier indicated the only recommendation of the Commission on Post Secondary Education the government will take action on is the extension of the open (non-institutionalized) sector.

In what appears to be the beginning of the new University of Ontario, Davis announced his government intends to "expand cultural and academic opportunities in the open sector. This will include the extension of educational broadcast services within the province."

This may mean more funding for the perennially poorly-financed Ryerson educational radio station, CJRT.

Davis also promised more correspondence courses at both secondary and post-secondary levels, as well as provincial funding for an internship program for fine arts students.

In a speech which had few surprises, Davis announced new programs to improve correctional services. He pledged the setting up of new correctional homes in residential areas to allow convicts to re-adjust to society.

He also said private enterprise will be allowed to expand industry into the prisons. In addition juvenile facilities will be placed closer to their own homes to have a more humane training school system.

New programs will also be begun in educating drivers about the dangers of drinking as well as a law forcing compulsory wearing of seatbelts.

Davis announced he will push through legislation outlawing teacher strikes and providing for compulsory arbitration.

Vague promises were made about improved health care provisions and environmental safeguards. The only concrete proposal was the possible reduction of outdoor advertising.

Promises were also made about improved housing and special consideration for the north in response to regional discontent.

Energy policy was not specified but Davis said an announcement was forthcoming.

A new improved financing scheme for daycare centres in low income areas was also promised with "use of school and other community facilities."

More recreation programs and a new code of family law as well as a new recruitment branch for female crown employees were also announced.

New legislation for consumers will include protection for consumers on warranties and contracts.

NDP leader Stephen Lewis commented after the speech that he was "unenthusiastic" about the speech which was "full of generalities and vagaries."

He said it had no measures on two of the most crucial problems, the cost of living and inflation. Lewis also noted the lack of any new educational policies. "It appears they are going to do nothing to extend the ceilings."

He called the new housing policy a "travesty", maintaining the government cannot rely on private enterprise or low and middle income earners will be left out in the cold.

Liberal leader Robert Nixon was even more critical, calling it the worst throne speech in 10 years. He said it was "weak and innocuous," charging there was virtually no action on housing.

Direct from Olympus came Bill Davis' speech from the throne yesterday.

GM accused of preventing mass transit

WASHINGTON (ZNS-CUPD)—An American Senate subcommittee has said it has obtained evidence indicating that General Motors has used its monopoly control of the transportation industry to prevent mass transportation systems from being built in the US.

The Senate Anti-trust and Monopoly Subcommittee has uncovered concrete evidence from former industry officials indicating that GM literally "prevented and frightened" competitors out of the mass transit field.

One of the findings of the subcommittee was that General Motors not only dominates the auto market, but makes 65 per cent of all city buses, more than 90 per cent of engines for city and inter-city buses and more than 80 per cent of all locomotives.

By manipulating production, the subcommittee said, GM can literally control the transportation market, making cars, trains or buses available depending on how attractive each market looks to GM.

As an example, the subcommittee said, it appears to be in GM's interest to make and sell more cars.

One GM bus, costing $40,000 could replace up to $350,000 worth of automobiles, and since GM controls the production and sale of both cars and buses GM can therefore promote cars, because the company's profits would be higher.

The committee, chaired by Sen. Philip Hart, began a series of public hearings on GM's alleged monopoly role Feb. 26.

Senate investigators have said that, on the basis of what they have found, the subcommittee will probably recommend that the General Motors Corporation be broken up by the Federal government.

An instance of GM's actions in relation to mass transit was by Los Angeles mayor Tom Bradley described to the committee.

Bradley charged that three big companies—General Motors, Standard Oil of California and Firestone—acted together in "calculated fashion" to dismantle the fast, low-cost and pollution-free trolley system that once existed in that city.

Los Angeles once had the world's largest interurban electric railway system, which provided swift, cheap, pollution-free service, Bradley said.

He said two years after GM, California Standard and Firestone organized Pacific Transit Lines in 1938, that company began to acquire and scrap the Pacific Electric System, which ran trolleys over 1,164 miles of track in more than 50 communities.

The downtown streetcar company was acquired by another subsidiary of the three concerns, he said, and it tore down the power transmission lines and uprooted the tracks.

In place of the streetcars, he said, the companies installed "GM diesel buses fueled by Standard Oil."

Question of honors degree still undecided

To honor or not to honor, that was the question. But the Arts and Science general committee could not decide how to do the honors.

In an unfinished debate which has lasted three meetings the committee referred the matter of honors to a subcommittee to be formed by dean Bob Greene.

Referral finally gained a majority after it became apparent no proposal had majority support. The committee has rejected three different versions of honors based on different systems of classifications.

A proposal by Woodsworth College principal Arthur Kruger was defeated which would have conferred first class honors on all four year degree candidates above 80 per cent and second class honors on all those between 75 and 80 per cent.

The proposal arises from the Berlyne committee implementation report. The committee has now been dealing with the Berlyne report and its implementation for almost a year.

The debate was long winded and repetitive of the last meetings with the proponents of the schemes stressing academic standards and the opposition stressing the foolishness of standardizing the vast number of subjects in Arts and Science.

Dean Greene told the meeting referral was necessary because the amendments had loopholes. He gave the example of two Moss scholarship applicants.

The math student had over 90 per cent and the philosophy student had 80. He said the math student was not necessarily the better student.

Another amendment proposed but never voted on offered degrees for high distinction in specialist programs.

The committee also approved a recommendation for lowering the requirement for four year from a full three year degree to 14 or 14 and a half courses from 15.

Student motions on tenure, parity and restructuring were delayed until April. They have been shunted to the bottom of four successive agendas.

Censorship in Brazil widens Church-state gap

BRASILIA (PRENSA LATINA - CUPD)—The recent assassination in a Brazilian prison of the Presbyterian activist, Pablo Wright, and the censorship of an editorial signed by the Archbishop of Sao Paulo, Evaristo Arns, have widened the gap between the Church and the military regime.

Wright was arrested last September in the city of Sao Paulo by the members of Department of Social and Political Order (DOPS).

The child of an American family of missionaries, the Christian fighter was a congressman until 1964 when he had to abandon the country, taking asylum in Mexico.

He then returned to Brazil where he lived clandestine until he was arrested.

At the beginning of the week of February 26, a document signed by several clandestine revolutionary organizations announced that Wright died in a police precinct after enduring prolonged torture.

Moverover, the bulletin of the Catholic Church of Sao Paulo, "Ecclesia," announced that for the first time the military government has forbidden the publication of an editorial written by the Archbishop of Sao Paulo, Monsignor Pablo Evaristo Arns.

According to the Catholic publication, until now the Brazilian military had not forbidden an article signed by the Church's top hierarchy.

Monsignor Arns' editorial which is entitled "The Use of Similar Weapons in the Loyal Struggle," states that everyone has the right to attack the Church, "but that she has no right to defend herself with the same weapons."

The bulletin affirms that other documents presented before the last edition were censored by the government.

"Ecclesia" went on to say several members and believers of religious institutions were arrested recently for political reasons.

The Brazilian military closed down two Catholic radio stations in December: the "Ninth of July" in the state of Sao Paulo, and "Radio Palmares" in the state of Alagoas.

According to a government communique, the shutdown was carried out because the radio stations on several occasions attacked the regime's economic and social policies.

During recent years, many priests and religious activists have been imprisoned, tortured, and assassinated as in the cases of Father Netto, in May 1969, and Pablo Wright.

Despite the political repression, the Catholic Church has been the only social sector of the country which dared to express an opinion about the present political system.

Poverty, unemployment, hunger and internal repression are constantly being commented on in the Catholic bulletin, weeklies and sermons.

The State-Church crisis increases daily in Brazil and Monsignor Arns himself, during a message sent from the Vatican last December, underscored the fact that forces from the capital of Brazil are active to obtain the "shutdown of all Catholic churches in the country."

Abortion: a medical problem not solved by legal definitions

The following feature adapted from the Osgoode Law School student newspaper, Obiter Dicta, analyzes the legal, ethical and moral issues of abortion. The article also attempts to bring out other factors encompassing eugenics, future prospects, and the alternatives to legalized abortion.

By DAHN BATCHELOR

With the continuing advance of new medical discoveries into the secrets of life in all its forms, discussion of the abortion question is comparable to lifting the lid of Pandora's Box.

Views on abortion raise various emotions, ranging from indifference, to remarks capable of rousing those to whom they are addressed to a murderous rage.

People advocating abortion on demand do so primarily out of consideration for the mother, and secondarily for reasons involving the future prospects of the unborn child, the socio-economic considerations of the family unit, and, finally, the so-called population factor.

On the other hand, those who speak out against abortion on demand do so on the premise that the sanctity of life takes precedence over all other considerations.

Both those speaking out for and against abortion cannot be ignored; however, for this same reason the question of abortion is very difficult to answer.

Therapeutic abortion committees

Section 251.4b of the Canadian Criminal Code, says an abortion must be performed by a qualified medical practitioner in an accredited or approved hospital and that the practitioner must first receive a certificate in writing from the therapeutic abortion committee of that hospital stating that the continuation of the patient's pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger her health. The therapeutic abortion committee must consist of not less than three members, each of whom must be a qualified medical practitioner and the practitioner performing the operation cannot sit on the committee.

However, no hospital is required to establish such a committee. When this bill was passed in 1969, it was believed most hospitals in Canada would form such committees. In December 1972, however, the federal government said that of the 932 accredited hospitals in Canada, only 261 had therapeutic abortion committees. Furthermore, several provinces had just a few and the Northwest Territories none at all.

This also means the abortion law is virtually a dead letter in Canada's approximately 275 Roman Catholic hospitals where abortion is regarded as murder.

Women in small towns and rural areas who do not have abortion committees in their nearest hospitals and are unable to travel to a large city for help, are forced to resort to illegal abortions which not only endanger their freedom but also their lives.

A woman's freedom is referred to in section 251.2 of the Criminal Code, which states that any pregnant female who uses any means or permits the use of any means with intent to procure her own miscarriage is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to two years of imprisonment.

"Any female" includes a 13 year old girl too ashamed to tell anyone she has been raped by her father and, in a effort to abort her unwanted pregnancy, places soap in her uterus.

The law as it presently stands makes it possible for a truly innocent child to suffer from triple jeopardy; first, she is raped, second, she risks death by self-induced abortion, and third, imprisonment by a society that doesn't understand her problem.

One might say with outraged indignation that Canada would never imprison a child under these circumstances. Hopefully that would be true, but if it's so why does section 251.1 begin with "any female"?

Difficult 'medical' decisions

Section 251.1 of the Criminal Code says everyone, who with intent to procure the miscarriage of a female person, whether or not she is pregnant, uses any means for the purpose of carrying out his intention, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

This section of the code can have far-ranging implications. If a doctor in a rural community realizes his wife will die within hours unless he aborts her pregnancy and consequently performs the operation and saves his wife's life, he can go to prison for the rest of his life because he didn't obtain a certificate in writing from the nearest therapeutic committee which, by coincidence, was in another province.

However, again people might cry out that Canada does not act without mercy. If that's so, why doesn't section 251.1 acknowledge there are exceptional circumstances which go beyond the conditions mentioned in section 251.4.b?

A doctor can be in quite a quandary when he has to decide whether to perform an abortion on his patient in order to save her life without acquiring the written authority of a committee. If he performs his operation and saves his patient's life, he goes to prison for life. If, on the other hand, he refuses to perform the abortion and, as a result of that decision, his patient dies, he can be charged with criminal negligence. According to section 202.1 if convicted, he can be sent to prison for life for refusing to perform a duty which is clearly his to do.

When a law is so ambiguous as to include such a far-reaching word as helath and not define it more clearly, it in essence, leaves the interpretation to those who must abide by it.

Morgentaler's example

Montreal physician Dr. Henry Morgentaler has recently stepped into the arena, putting his freedom and medical practice on the line and spoken out in defence of the right of women to decide for themselves about abortion. The government has known for years that Morgentaler has opened his clinic to thousands of women from Canada and the United States and via the vacuum aspirator has performed nothing but abortions in his clinic.

The authorities finally decided to act when Morgentaler demonstrated his technique on television. He was charged and his peers found him not guilty by accepting the defence that, according to section 45 of the Criminal Code, everyone is protected from criminal responsibility for performing a surgical operation upon any person for the benefit of that person, if the operation is performed with reasonable care and skill, (and) it is reasonable to perform the operation, having regard to the state of the health of the person at the time the operation is performed and to all the circumstances of the case.

If a would-be doctor fails in the operation and the patient dies on him he knows his next operation will be of a machine that makes licence plates.

However, the day may come when abortifacient drugs will become readily available to women for their use up to at least eight weeks after conception.

The present law pertaining to abortion is imposing morality and, as such, is compounding the suffering and injustice on twentieth-century women by an obsolete nineteenth-century law. The fact that women do not have control over their own bodies may very well conflict with the Canadian Bill of Rights.

It's incredible that in Canada a pregnant woman can attempt to kill herself and not be charged under any law in Canada. However, she can be sent to prison for attempting to abort her own pregnancy. Perhaps her next defence to section 251.2 is one of attempted suicide. Soap in the uterus may be a considered a strange way to attempt suicide, but the intent is formed and who can say what is really in the mind of a desperate woman?

Eleanor Wright Pelrine in her book "Abortion in Canada" said that a surprising number of obstetricians and gynecologists reveal attitudes which range from paternalism, to impatience, to dislike, hostility, and actual contempt for a woman to seek an abortion. She further stated that a chief of obstetrics and gynecology in a large Toronto hospital asserted that women are lazy and irresponsible. He said if abortion on demand becomes easy for them, they would be coming to hospitals for abortions the way they go to beauty parlors to have their hair done.

The doctor fails to take into consideration the natural reluctance of human beings to permit tampering with their bodily mechanisms and to endure pain and discomfort. Dentists often point out that this reluctance keeps many people away from dental treatment. In the same way abortion is unlikely to inspire delight in women and encourage them to undergo it for some frivolous reason.

Medical profession deletes abortion from code of ethics

In 1970 the Canadian Medical Association deleted all reference to abortion from its code of ethics. More significantly, it took a positive stand on possible conflicts between a doctor's personal moral philosophy and the good of his patient.

Section 15 of the code of ethics as adopted June 16, 1970, states: "An ethical physician will, when his personal morality prevents him from recommending some form of therapy which might benefit his patient, acquaint the patient with these factors." There is nothing in that section which really permits a physician to refer his patient to an abortionist, yet over 300 doctors in Canada and the US referred their patients to Morgentaler in Montreal.

Many doctors may not be inclined to refer their patients to a competent, medically-trained abortionist for varying reasons, such as those proposed by the chief of obstetrics and gynecology interviewed by Mrs. Pelrine.

Dr. Robert Hall, writing in the August, 1970, issue of Playboy said:

"I thought I could differentiate the truly desperate women, overburdened by an urgent psychiatric problem, from the merely inconvenienced women facing an everyday dilemma, and further, I thought that only the former deserved an abortion. After listening to a few hundred such women, however, I learned that the distinction between the two types is unimportant, and what's more, that distinction is none of my business."

Mr. Justice Hugeson, in his two and one-half hour charge to the jurors told them they had to decide whether it was reasonable—medically speaking—for Morgentaler to perform the operation up to the point of breaking the law. The jury returned a "not guilty" verdict which, aside from opening the way to abortion on demand, allowed for the use of clinics rather than just hospitals. Finally the verdict has implied that therapeutic abortion clinics may be abrogated in the near future.

The jury has, through its decision, in effect stated that the laws in Canada pertaining to abortion must be changed and updated to meet the complexities of the present world. The government no doubt recognizes the far-reaching effect of the verdict and its effect on the Canadian public. Therefore, it's understandable why the government is appealing the verdict.

The verdict has opened the way for anyone to perform any operation and come out of his trial unscathed if he can successfully prove he used care and skill, that the operation was necessary and there was no one else nearby that was qualified to perform the operation in time. And if he should be so lucky to have his patient benefit from his efforts, who could convict?

Abortion: religious and moral prohibitions?

Most arguments against granting women the right to abortion on request are based on religious and moral prohibitions, defending the sanctity of life. But basic to these arguments is the question of where life begins. Opponents of abortion contend a human life begins at the moment of conception, and, in the case of Roman Catholic doctrine, human life is destroyed when the unborn fetus is removed from the uterus.

Even among the most vigorous proponents of the repeal of laws forbidding abortion, there appears to be consensus that a fetus has a right to be born unless its extinction can be justified by at least one of the following reasons: its birth would be detrimental to itself, to its mother, or to the family into which it would be born. In other words, the fetus cannot be arbitrarily or capriciously deprived of its right to be born.

It is interesting to note that, until 1869, Catholic doctrine taught the soul enters the growing fetus about 40 days after conception for a male and 80 days after conception for a female. Little is known as to how the church was able to determine the sex of the unborn fetus. It was the edict of Pope Pious IX 1869 that declared the soul enters the fetus at the moment of conception so that the destruction of the fetus at any point during the period of gestation is an act of murder.

Catholics are not, of course, united in condemning abortion, just as they are not united in accepting the church's stand on contraception.

Now that Catholic hospitals are almost completely supported by public funds, should they have the right to limit the procedures that can be carried out on the premises based on philosophical or moral grounds alone? Should doctors not bound by Catholic dogma be able to perform abortions in Catholic hospitals if abortion does not conflict with their own ideological views? And should this be contingent on the fact that the Catholic hospital is the only hospital in the community? (It is a well-known fact that many of the medical staff in Catholic hospitals are predominantly non-Catholic.)

Also, the Law of Judaism clearly implies the human conscience is meant to enforce laws, not to make them. Right and wrong, good and evil, are absolute values which transcend the variations of time, place and environment. These values derive their validity from the Divine revelation at Mount Sinai, as expounded and developed by sages faithful to and authorized by its writ.

Of course, if the truly were to accept the law in would still be stoning those those that gather sticks or

It should be stressed, however, that the law assumes the full title to life. The ruling sanctioning abortion in her mortal coil child, is the sole reference to the biological growth and weighing of values on life in any given case. Such a judgement is entirely outside the province of a medical problem. Such value judgements are not a medical problem, but a judgement of moral, not Rabbi Dr. Immanuel J. Schochet, in his view, said: "The decision as to what circumstances it is justifying human life depends on weighing of values on life in any given case. Such a judgement is entirely outside the province of a medical problem. Such value judgements are not a medical problem, but a judgement of moral, not

When one considers the question of when value human life, the range of is just as great.

When attempting to determine when life begins, one must consider many factors. First, when we are speaking of life as a human being, we must then determine when it becomes a human entity.

The beginnings of a human being, with two separate living cells, one male and one female, are hypothetical, be at approximately 24 hours prior to conception, a human being, is two cells. Also, the egg may have been fertilized two or more years before the sperm is introduced, hence the two cells are separated by both time and space. The nucleus of the sperm joins the ovum, the two living cells begin life as a human being.

With the introduction of parthenogenesis, the nucleus of the female may be enucleated egg cell resulting in a child. Experimentation has been successful. Needless to say, there would never be very popular. Inherent dangers of intervention, it would take a long time.

Medical advances may change birth processes

Science has been able to create a fetal incubator in which the fetus can float in synthetic amniotic fluid. Although the human fetuses have never been brought to full term in the incubator, it is conceivable that before long, the miracle of birth will be duplicated in the fetal incubator.

It is within the realm of possibility that in the next century, women will have the embryo removed from their wombs, placed in an incubator in a clinic and then will return to the clinic nine months later to pick up their babies.

Parents of incubator babies may not be so prone to seeking an abortion if given the opportunity to visit the fetus periodically to see their own creation gradually becoming the reality of their dreams.

The day is rapidly approaching when geneticists will be able to search for Barr bodies in the microscopic cells (as yet undifferentiated) that make up the blastocyst of the fertilized egg. By doing this it will become possible to determine the sex of the human blastocysts. Since a number of diseases are sex-linked, it may be socially, morally and ethically correct not to replace the blastocyst in the womb and as such, this might be a far more acceptable procedure than a full-scale abortion of the implanted thriving fetus.

Since moralists may still feel that this procedure is a form of abortion, they may readily accept a procedure that precludes fertilization.

The chromosomes of the male sperm determine the sex of the fertilized egg, and the basic differences with reference to shape and speed account for the final result.

It might one day be possible to develop a filter, perhaps like an interuterine contraceptive device, that would screen out either male or female type sperm. Or in the alternative, the sperm might be separated in the test tube and therefore only one type of sperm might be separated in the test tube and therefore only one type of sperm might be artificially introduced into the vaginal canal.

Choice of sex might add as a control on family size, offering parents a boy and a girl, removing the need to keep trying for a boy or a girl to complete the family.

When is abortion safe?

Placing values on the various stages of a human being in the gestation period is extremely difficult. Since the embryo becomes a fetus at the eighth week and electrical activity can be detected in the brain of the fetus at the beginning of the eighth week, we might draw the line at this point of gestation. We know that when an EEG cannot detect electrical activity in the brain (this being an Iso-electric EEG) it is presumed the patient is dead and as such, can feel no pain.

One might believe, however, that prior to the fetal stage where there is no electrical activity in the brain, the embryo is not aware even of its existence or presence. Although the fetus can hear sounds 16 weeks after conception, who is to say that from the eighth week to the sixteenth week, the newly-created fetus is not fully aware as to what is happening to it? Can we be absolutely sure that the fetus at any stage of its development, cannot feel or is unaware that it is being deprived of life?

In a human being in the womb of its mother is to be terminated, then let it be done prior to the eighth week of gestation, while in the zygote or embryo stage, on the premise that it is merciful to perform a surgical operation on a person oblivious to pain than on one who is not.

Pregnant women and doctors who do not believe in abortion—who believe that it is murder—need not avail themselves of it. On the other hand, their belief should not limit the rights of those not bound by identical religious or moral convictions.

It is common knowledge that the fetus at approximately 16 weeks onward can hear a multiplicity of sounds that range from his mother's heartbeat, her voice, to outside noises. It cannot be overstressed that parents of soon-to-be-born-children should be advised by their doctors to never discuss abortion or even attempt it from this crucial period in the formation of the fetus. An unconscious mind of a fetus can register forever the discussion or actual attempts at abortion.

Illegal abortions often disastrous

Each year in North America, over one million women resort to illegal abortions. Of that number, 5,000 of their sisters die in pain and terror as a result of their choosing illegality over a law they feel is unfair and unnecessary. It is impossible to describe even in the minutest detail the types of experiences these women go through.

Dr. Donald Low, former chairman of the therapeutic abortion committee of the Ontario Medical Association found that a few years ago, half the admissions to gynecological wards in Ontario were the results of injuries suffered from illegal abortions.

If a woman performs an abortion upon herself and complications set in, the results can be disastrous. Even when she is dying, she has three fears: that her family will know, the church will know and the authorities will know. And for this reason, many women choose to die alone and without help. Such a typical woman waits for death, in pain and bleeding profusely, faintly hoping that her body will correct itself and that the damage she has done to herself will heal.

And when she finally dies, what she had feared the most, becomes a reality. Her family, the church and the authorities finally know.

Symbionese structure, goals show contradictions

The Symbionese Liberation Army (SLA) has claimed credit for the kidnapping of Patricia Hearst, heiress to the Hearst newspaper empire, and is holding her for a ransom of food to be distributed to poor people in California.

Very little information about the SLA has appeared in the mass media describing the organization itself aside from speculation about who is or is not a member.

In an effort to provide the news the dailies have missed, The Variety is reprinting sections of two statements by the SLA, their goals and their description of their structure.

The goals of the Symbionese Liberation Army:

1. To unite all oppressed people into a fighting force and to destroy the system of the capitalist state and all its value systems.

To create in its place a system and sovereign nation that are in the total interest of all its races and people, based on the true affirmation of life, love, trust and honesty, freedom and equality that is truly for all.

2. To assure the rights of all people to self determination and the rights to build their own nation and government, with representatives that have shown through their actions to be in the interest of their people.

To give the right to all people to select and elect their own representatives and governments by direct vote

3. To build a people's federated council who will be a male and female of each people's council or sovereign nation of the Symbionese Federation of Nations who shall be representative of their nations in the forming of trade pacts and unified defence against any external enemy that may attack any of the free nations of the federation and to form other aids to each other's needs.

4. To aid and defend the cultural rights of all the sovereign nations of the Symbionese Federation, and to aid each nation on the building of educational and other institutions to meet and serve this need for its people.

5. To place the control of all the institutions and industries of each nation into the hands of its people.

To aide sovereign nations of the federation to build nations where work contributes concretely to the full interest of needs of its workers and the communal interest of its communities and its people and the mutual interest of all within the federation of nations.

6. To aide and defend the rights of all oppressed people to build nations which do not institute oppression and exploitation, but rather does institute the environment of freedom and defends that freedom on all levels and for all of the people, and by any means necessary.

7. To give back to all people their human and constitutional rights, liberty, equality and justice and the right to bear arms in the defense of these rights.

8. To create a system where our aged are cared for with respect, love and kindness and aided and encouraged to become assets in their own ways to their nations and to their communal community.

That the life that moves around them is not a frightening and murderous one and where life is not a fear, but rather one of love and feeling of unity.

9. To create a system and laws that will neither force people into nor force them to stay into personal relationships that they do not wish to be in and to destroy all chains instituted by legal and social laws of the capitalist state which acts as a reinforcing system to maintain this form of imprisonment.

10. To create institutions that will aid, reinforce and educate the growth of our comrade women and aid them in making a new true and better role to life and in the defining of themselves as a new and free people.

11. To create new forms of life and relationships that bring true meanings of love to people's relationships and to form communes on the community level and bring the children of the community into being the responsibility of the community.

To place our children in the union of real comradeship and in the care of loving interest of the revolutionary community.

12. To destroy the prison system, which the capitalist state has used to imprison the oppressed and exploited, and thereby destroy the love, unity and hopes of millions of lives and families.

And to create in its place a system of comradeship and that of group unity and education on a communal and revolutionary level within the community and to bring home our daughters and sons, and sisters and brothers, father and mothers and welcome them home with love and a new revolutionary comradeship of unity.

13. To take control of all state land and that of the capitalist class and to give back the land to the people.

To form laws and modes that safeguard that no person can own the land, or sell the land, but rather the nation's people own the land and use it for their needs and interest to live.

No one can own or sell the air, the sky, the water, the trees, the birds, the sun, for all of this world belongs to the people of this earth.

14. To take control of all buildings and apartment buildings of the capitalist class and fascist government and to totally destroy the rent system of exploitation.

15. To build a federation of nations, who shall formulate programs and unions of actions and interests that will destroy the capitalist value system and its other anti-human institutions and who will be able to do this by meeting all the basic needs of all the people and their nations.

For they will be all able to do this because each nation will have full control of all of its industries and institutions and does not run them for profit, but in the full interest of all the people of its nation.

16. To destroy all forms and institutions of racism, sexism, ageism, capitalism, fascism, individualism, possessiveness, competitiveness and all other such institutions that have made and sustained capitalism and the capitalist class system that has oppressed and exploited all of the people of our history.

The following is the SLA statement of the organization's structure and strategy:

1. Collectively develop a common strategy.

2. Work together to develop tactical co-ordination.

3. Assist each other in developing the abilities and talents of all members of the Symbionese War Council and to analyze the strengths and weaknesses of the leadership in order to constantly better all aspects of the ability and actions of the war council, and its individual leadership from other organizations.

4. Command positions of the War Council are subject to approval of all members of the council based upon the military political thinking and ability of the officer to work with others in the interest of freedom for all people and races.

5. Command positions in the War Council are not appointed by one who knows one's sex, one's color or by the group organization one belongs to but only by one's courage, determination, intelligence, aggressive initiative and capability as a leader and one's military-political thinking.

6. All members of the War Council are expected and fully responsible for the military-political leadership of the SLA.

They must fight and speak for the people and this must be understood clearly by all members.

7. No member of the War Council can elect or select himself or herself to a position such as the head of a government or people's council; the War Council is totally an alliance of war against the common enemy.

The people themselves shall have and hold the only right to select and elect their governments and government heads of state.

8. It is not the policy of the War Council to rip off leadership or membership from other organizations.

But rather it is the policy of the War Council to aid and support the development and education of leadership to fulfill truly its responsibility to the people, and to allow the collective intelligence, leadership and resourcefulness of the leadership from different organizations and groups to flourish together and grow together thereby forming an area where the collective interests and needs as well as weaknesses and strengths of each can benefit each in the common struggle to liquidate the common enemy.

9. A successful military force is a necessity for actualizing political goals and must therefore be held as a priority.

Therefore, the true assistance in the supplying of military equipment, materials, finances, personnel is of the utmost importance once these forces have fully committed themselves to open and total warfare against the common enemy and members of the War Council must understand this clearly.

10. Leadership of any group or organization who is truly committed and in agreement with the goals of the SLA and the terms of military-political alliance may be presented to the War Council.

However, the presented officer's membership is not confirmed until it is verified that prior to presentation for membership a combat action has been taken part in by that group or organization within the last 12 months.

11. Once the War Council collectively agrees to an action or plan of strategy then that actions (sic) shall be understood as an action of the SLA and not of any single group or organization.

Just as the fingers cannot call themselves a fist and the fist cannot call itself fingers, from time to time the membership of the War Council may disagree upon a particular action or strategy.

When in disagreement, that particular membership need not participate in the SLA action, but membership on the War Council is maintained only as long as all commitments made to the collective Symbionese War Council are continued to be fully adhered to.

It is the disagreeing group or organization's responsibility to, on its own, prove out their ideas in order to change or modify its own or the collective War Council's direction.

12. It is the policy of the War Council not to involve itself in the internal political affairs of disagreements that may result within different organizations or groups.

However, the War Council recognizes and accepts membership to the council of any military-political unit, cell or organization that qualifies and shall recognize them as true representatives of that particular organization or group.

It is the collective policy of the War Council that the failure of the elected leadership to take her or his revolutionary responsibility as far as the War Council is concerned shall be totally the responsibility of the elected leader and not that of the War Council.

13. Organizations or groups that wish to serve in combat units must select two persons, one female and one male — if possible — who have full responsibility and authority to act and represent their group or organization and who will hold a command position in the unified command of the United Symbionese War Council.

All members of the Symbionese War Council must clearly understand that our commitment is total and our goal is the total freedom of the people and children and the destroying totally of the common enemy.

Therefore it is held that any restraining of supplies or other war materials, etc., for political reasons or reactionary reasons or political chess games with the enemy, by any officer or other persons in the War Council that by its actions endangers the lives of the women and men of the Symbionese Liberation Army shall be held as full and total violation of this alliance pact and compromising with the enemy and the freedom and life of the people and children and therefore is punishable by death.

US rebuked on Cuba

MEXICO CITY (PRENSA LATINA —CUPI) — Although it did not attend the Tlatelolco Conference of the organization of American States in Mexico City, Cuba scored a political and diplomatic victory over the United States when over half the Hemispheric foreign ministers came out against the economic blockade of the island in favour of resumption of diplomatic relations.

The isolation of Cuba is untenable, was the majority view which implies acknowledgement of the failure of the Organization of American States (OAS).

Argentina, Peru, Panama, Venezuela, Mexico, Jamaica, Trinidad-Tobago, Colombia, Guyana, Barbados, Costa Rica, Honduras and Bahamas upheld that view.

U.S. Secretary of State, Henry Kissinger, reiterated the policy of blockade and aggression which his country has applied to Cuba for the past fifteen years, but his words were echoed by a small chorus comprised of Brazil, Bolivia, Chile and Guatemala.

"We do not feel that this is the proper forum for discussing this problem," Kissinger sidestepped.

"It is hardly realistic to fail to settle the Cuban issue," stated Jamaican Foreign Minister Dudley Thompson.

"I don't know how Mr. Kissinger can speak here about world relations and yet refuse to deal with the Cuban issue," he asserted.

General Miguel Angel de la Flor, the Peruvian Foreign Minister, called upon Kissinger to end the blockade against Cuba and the policy of discrimination and isolation.

Venezuelan Foreign Minister Aristides Calvani also came out in favor of the end of the blockade. In regard to diplomatic relations he stated at a press conference: "The new president elect (Carlos Andres Perez who will take office April 12) has made some statements that at least imply a desire to move in that direction."

Colombian Minister Alfredo Vasquez Carrizosa stated, for his part, "many countries of the region already maintain relations with the Cuban Government without the consent of the OAS and that means, we need to consider the matter on a collective basis."

Mexico, the host country, at no time obeyed the OAS resolution, inspired by the United States, on breaking with Cuba.

Peru, Argentina, Trinidad-Tobago, Jamaica, Barbados, and Guyana have diplomatic relations with Havana, regardless of OAS.

'Potentially a revolutionary force'

Women told to organize own trade unions

By BOB BETTSON

York History lecturer Virginia Hunter told a large audience Sunday the women's liberation movement is potentially a revolutionary movement.

She saw the answer to women's oppression in the capitalist economic system in organizing women in independent Canadian trade unions.

Hunter was speaking to a Waffle lecture series on the Economics of Canadian Politics. She launched into a long detailed speech by reading a paper she had prepared on an economic view of women's oppression.

She concluded women are essential to capitalism to act as cheap labor to ensure super-profits to the capitalist class. Therefore, she concluded, women are an essential part of the Canadian economic system.

She said the waste of human resources through the oppression of women in the capitalist system is extremely evident. After going through the reams of statistics proving how women are channelled into service and menial jobs in the labor force, she concluded by saying there is no hope for piece-meal reforms of the system.

Statistics prove women are getting $20 to $40 less a week for the same work in a number of fields. And only a small percentage are in the lucrative professions and managerial classes.

While pointing out the main development in the Canadian working force has been the larger number of women employed, she said the increase is mostly in married women working, mostly of necessity to supplement the low income of the husband and pay for the increased cost of living.

The pattern of "women's work" remains, with the largest number of women in clerical, typing, teaching, nursing and other low paid service jobs.

She also pointed out that in a Marxist sense women make up a reserve army, which can be used in the event of an emergency by the capitalist system then tossed aside.

They mostly contribute "unproductive labor" in a Marxist sense. That is, their labor does not reproduce itself in terms of creating profits for capitalists. They are occupied in service industries and their salaries are part of overhead rather than the costs of production.

While seeing unions and women's caucuses in unions as one way of organizing, Hunter was quick to point out how little concern the international unions have for organizing female workers. Women are for the most part an unorganized sector and this contributes to their oppression.

She called union efforts in this area poor.

Co-op in trouble

Pestalozi College, Ottawa's answer to Rochdale College, appears headed down the same financial path of court actions seeking back mortgage money.

The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which holds first mortgages on both Pestalozi and Rochdale, claims in its latest audit Pestalozi is averaging a $39,000 deficit during the last seven months.

In a scenario remarkably similar to recent events surrounding Rochdale, the city of Ottawa claims Pestalozi owes more than $400,000 in back taxes.

Pestalozi is in receivership and the CMHC says it will begin foreclosure proceedings on its 90 per cent first mortgage.

CMHC won its foreclosure proceeding on Rochdale's 90 per cent first mortgage last month, but the decision is being appealed.

Meanwhile Rochdale is looking for a buyer for its building as Rochdale residents plan to move elsewhere in the city.

Repressive economic policies slated for Chile

SANTIAGO (CUPI) — For the seventh time since it seized power, the Chilean junta has decreed a currency devaluation.

This means higher prices for imported goods in a country which suffered an unprecedented 700 per cent rate of inflation in 1973.

The military government has initiated a new economic policy which, according to junta spokesmen, is aimed at putting the nation's economy on a sound footing.

The policy is based on raising taxes, lowering the standard of living and increasing production.

The official figures on the tax raise have not been released but are expected to run from 30 per cent to 50 per cent. A further tax of $70 will be placed on people wishing to leave the country.

Presently there is a basic tax of $470 - $285 to leave the country, $60 airport tax and $125 for a passport. The average wage of a Chilean worker is $45 a month.

Because of a general adjustment of domestic prices in October, and wage increases which did not compensate for inflation, workers have lost 38 per cent of their purchasing power according to the junta's Manufacturing Association (Sociedad de Fomento Fabril).

However, other sources place the figure at 50 per cent.

The junta has also decided to offer incentives to foreign companies to invest in Chile.

The Bank of Chile, headed by General Eduardo Cao, has announced a modified exchange rate beneficial to foreign investors, by guaranteeing re-export to capital and profits.

This will allow foreign companies to invest money in a project in Chile, derive profits from it but take them out of the country thus using up the resources without developing the country significantly.

The Central Bank of Chile holds the exchange rate for foreign trade dollars at 450 escudos to the dollar while the exchange rate for tourists remains at 750 escudos to the dollar.

Chile must import most of its industrial supplies but this year it will also have to import $550 million in food.

This year's oil imports alone will cost $450 million while last year Chile's total export income was only $13 hundred million.

The junta justifies the policies, saying the country is $4.5 billion in debt to the United States, Japan, Canada, and Western Europe.

However, they did not appear so concerned about the debt when they offered Anaconda Mining, an American firm, over $1 million as compensation for nationalization of their Chilean holdings by the overthrown Popular Unity government.

The junta has also returned over 324 companies, accounting for 60 per cent of the gross national product, nationalized under the Popular Unity government, to their former owners.

Gay civil rights demands rejected education about and protection against discrimination.

The requests were made by the Gay Alliance Toward Equality (GATE) in August and OHRC's stalling on a response led 35 persons to picket the OHRC last month.

GATE says acting commission chairman Dr. Walter Currie informed them it would reject the requests but continue an earlier offer to mediate in individual cases of discrimination against homosexuals in jobs and housing.

GATE says Currie's position is "condescending tokenism" which "effectively condones the general hostility and ignorance which dehumanize gay men and women."

The organization had included in its request that the OHRC urge the provincial government to include "sexual orientation" in the areas of legislation requiring no discrimination.

With the response from the commission, GATE says it now plans to mount "a large lobbying campaign with MPPs to get sexual orientation included in the Human Rights Code."

As a precedent for this action, GATE cites a 1972 amendment to the code which prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex. That clause, designed to protect women, was inserted without public support from the OHRC.

TEACH IN on RACISM and the UNIVERSITY

featuring Ashley Montagu

FRIDAY, MARCH 8, 1974
CONVOCATION HALL
UNIVERSITY of TORONTO

"Academic racism" is alive and still well in the universities. Arthur Jensen of Berkeley and William Schockley of Stanford say hereditary factors give blacks lower intelligence than whites. Richard Herrnstein of Harvard claims "unemployment may run in the genes like bad teeth". Edward Banfield of Pennsylvania explains southern Italian poverty by the "amoral" character of its residents. Dr. John Baker of Oxford, and Hans Eysenck of London, both prominent English scholars, also number in the ranks of the "academic racists".

Pseudo-scientific theories that justify racism are nothing new to the university; these modern ideologies merely rewrite garbage that has been around for decades. But their influence is staggering. They are published in the most prestigious academic journals, they teach at the most prominent universities, and their books and articles are used at universities from one end of the continent to the other — including the University of Toronto.

10:00 AM
Medical Sciences Auditorium

Prof. Grant Cooper, Dept. of History at University of Arkansas in Little Rock: "Banfield's theories of cultural deprivation". The University of Arkansas is currently trying to fire Dr. Cooper for fighting the use of Banfield's books on university courses.

Prof. Donald Smith and Prof. Sinclair Robinson, Dept. of French, at Carleton University in Ottawa: Racist Attitudes and Approaches Towards the Teaching of "Joual" or Canadian French.

Roy Brown, Chicago: "Genetic and Cultural Theories of Racism". Mr. Brown, a former janitor at the University of Chicago, is writing a book rebutting the theories of Jensen and Banfield.

Banfield's book about Italian amorality is taught at the U of T. Herrnstein and Jensen find their way into psychology and education classes. Carl Bereiter of OISE professes that black ghetto children have a "non-logical mode of speech". Ian Hector, of the Medical School, claims Italians are "culturally predisposed" to fake injury.

The Teach In On Racism and the University is being held to raise and expose the racist myths that hide under the cloak of scholarship. The issues are vital. They are being debated in universities, professional associations, and journals around the world.

We urge all professors and students to cancel classes on March 8 and to attend this important Teach In.

1:00 PM
Convocation Hall

Ashley Montagu, world renowned anthropologist, author of some forty books: "Race, Intelligence, and the Intelligence Testers".

Prof. Tobias Schwarz, Dept. of Physiology, University of Connecticut, and Co-Chairman of the Committee Against Racism: "Academic Racism, and the Fight Against It".

Toronto excels in judo

Toronto dominated the OUAA judo championships this weekend by defeating Waterloo in the finals. Team members were Paul Nador, Ford Kawano, Greg Doulet, Dave Passmore and Marty Zajdner.

The following team members placed in the individual competition: Kawano was first in heavyweight brown and black; Doulet, third in middleweight brown and black; Passmore second in lightweight brown and black; M. Young, second in heavyweight green and blue; Ray St. Laurent, third in lightweight white, yellow and orange; Harry Smith, first in lightweight white, yellow and orange; and Walter Perchal, fourth in middleweight white, yellow and orange.

The Varsity competitors were coached by Goki Vermura and Chris Preobrazonski.

The Guelph Gryphons, a cinderella team if ever there was one, captured the CIAU basketball championship last weekend, scoring in the last six seconds to down St. Mary's 74-72. Guelph was invited as a wildcard to the championship even though they had been eliminated earlier and they knocked off Sir George and Acadia to reach the finals. St. Mary's, who won the football College Bowl this year, still have a chance to win the CIAU hockey championship, especially with the Blues out. Not bad for a school with 2500 students and only alleged under-the-table athletic scholarships to keep them in contention. . Ryerson emerged as winners of the OUAA round-robin table tennis championships held at Ryerson Saturday. . U of T gymnast Jennifer Diachun finished first to lead the OUWAA to the women's title at the Canadian gymnastics competition at York last weekend. She accumulated 34.6 points, finishing first in all four women's events uneven bars, balance beam, floor exercises and vaulting. Ontario finished first with 167.7 points, Canada West was second with 143.9 and the Great Plains third with 101.85. . In the men's gymnastics, Canada West edged Ontario 234.65 to 229.55. U of T gymnast Steve Mitruk lead with 52 points, winning the vaulting, pommel horse, parallel bars and horizontal bars. . The Benson Building is offering free golf lessons to women by Bill Whitcombe, CPGA golf pro. Hours of instruction are from 10 pm to 4 pm Monday through Thursday with the exception of noon to 1 pm. Lessons are also given Friday morning from 10 pm to 1 pm. All equipment is supplied. The inter-faculty volleyball finals were played at Erindale this week. The two finalists were Scarborough and Erindale. Scarborough captured the championships when they downed the Erindale team 2-1. Scarborough didn't lose a match all season. Members of the Scarborough team were: Herridge, Kent, Lotocky, Blocksman, Ianicki, Farquarson, Pylipir. Members of the Erindale squad were: Ciemgalis, Habs, Ozolins' Turin, Lis, Lewitsky and Pauker. . The men's inter-faculty curling finals were won by a team manned by John Peacock (skip), Robert Gander (vice-skip), Stephen Lamont (second), and Bruce Read (lead). Members of the runner-up team were Ian Harper (skip), Jim Cooper (vice-skip), Bob Harris (second), and Mark Rosenhek (lead). .

That great American-owned bastion of Canadian free enterprise, IBM Canada Ltd. of Toronto, has scored a juicy $3 million contract with the Canadian government.

In the greatest tradition of Canadian nationalism, the three million green ones will pour south of the border so Canada's very own finest, the RCMP—otherwise known as Dief's Dicks, will have the very finest in computers.

Now these are not ordinary computers those wonder chaps in the states are giving our Dudley Dorights.

These are the super-duper everything jobs which figure out everything: like stolen cars, fugitives from justice, all-points-bulletins from Interpol, and while nobody's saying so unconfirmed rumors from unreliable sources say the tax department is getting curious.

The Mounties computer capacity will be increased 2½ times and more than 500 police centres in Canada will have access to the computer.

In plain English this means the cop on the beat in Flin Flon will be able to check out the stolen cars from Scarborough as quickly as the narc squad in Halifax.

The Vancouver police will be able to get the goods on a petty theft artist in Churchill before you can sing a chorus of "God Save the Queen."

Fac hockey playoffs begin with upsets

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

The defeat Western handed the Blues last Friday must have influenced several teams in the division I playoffs because three out of the four quarter-finals resulted in upsets.

Law I, who grabbed a playoff spot as a wild-card, overcame a two goal deficit and upset Erindale, the division IA leaders, by a score of 3-2.

In another stunning reversal, New I, who only finished third in division IB, nursed a 2-1 lead all the way to victory over the division IA powerhouse Vic I.

Another third place finisher, SMC A, scored a desperate goal in the last 45 seconds to tie Dents and then went on to oust the division IB leaders 5-4 in overtime.

In the other division I A & B quarter-final, PHE A, as expected, ground out a victory over Grads I, winning 3-0.

In the game against Law, Erindale poured on the pressure in the opening minutes, using good positional play and relentless forechecking to confuse the lawlers.

This paid off at the four minute mark when Mathe centred the puck to Modesto who, after a moment of hesitation, sliced the puck into the twine to give Erin a 1-0 lead.

Erin's superior bench strength and younger legs continued to carry the play, and a minute later, Wilson, left uncovered in front of the Law net, drilled a goal into the lower corner to give his team a 2-0 lead.

But Law didn't give up. Five minutes later, after a protracted goalmouth struggle, McDonald banged in a loose rebound past Dent goalie McKay to put Law back in the game.

Obviously elated, Law pressed their attack and only 38 seconds later, McDonald popped in another goal, after collaring a rebound from a team-mate's longshot.

Erin had a chance to put the game on ice when Brewer blocked a slapshot from the law pointman and got a breakaway. He put at least four moves on Law goalie Durno who still managed a sensational save.

After that key play, it was all downhill for Erin as they stopped skating and lounged around the centre-ice area waiting for an opening.

Halfway through the second period the opening finally came — to Law. After a face-off in the Erin end, the puck squirted out to Morrison, who deftly side-stepped an Erin forward, and rifled a shot into the lower right-hand corner of the Erin net.

Despite a sudden surge of the strength that made Erin almost un-

If you think this slapshot went in the net — you're wrong. It skimmed by the far post to the relief of the New College goalkeeper. In a big upset, New defeated Vic I 2-1, to advance to the semi-finals of the interfaculty hockey playoffs.

beatable during the regular season, Law didn't wilt under the pressure and escaped with the win.

In the wide-open game between Dents and SMC, the lead changed hands several times before finally coming to rest with SMC.

Nabeta opened the scoring for Dents on a fluke goal from a sharp angle during a scramble. But SMC tied it up quickly when Kahnert took a pass from McKenzie and steered it through the surprised goalkeeper's legs.

SMC led 2-1 at the close of the period on a shot Tate drifted through a crowd into the net.

In the second period the dentists got two goals within four minutes to go ahead 3-2. Burman, a former Blue, deflected an angle shot by T'naka into the net for the first goal and then assisted on a goal by Raham during a scramble.

Then Burman made it 4-2 Dents, scoring on a breakaway despite the efforts of a SMC defenceman who was wrapped around him for the last 15 feet.

But with only a few minutes left, SMC's Corcoran netted a goal to draw his team to within a goal of the dentists. SMC then pulled out all the stops, one of which was their goalie, and it worked — with 43 seconds left on the clock and their net empty, Brady deflected McKenzie's slapshot into the net to send it into overtime.

With supporters from both sides cheering them on, both teams came within a whisker of scoring. Dents looked like they might go on to win it but a defensive miscue in their own end ended it — SMC's Tate intercepted a stray clearing pass and blasted a 15 foot shot over Dents' goalie Dougherty's shoulder to send SMC into the semi-finals.

In the biggest upset, New scored the first and last goal of the game, and that was enough to edge Vic 2-1. Carey and Marmsey scored for New while Teefour tallied for Vic. During the last three minutes, Vic had a two man advantage and hit the goal post four times but just couldn't get the equalizer.

PHE ended Grads I's hopes for any further games, downing them 3-0. PHE scored in the first 15 seconds and never looked over their shoulder after that. Their superior positional play and team spirit demoralized the graduates from the beginning as the latter never really recovered from the quickness and ease of the first goal.

Just after the opening face-off, PHE got the puck and charged up the ice, leaving a trail of graduates behind them. PHE's Ackley then easily rammed the puck home to give his team a 1-0 lead.

Several minutes later, with the score the same, the Grads lost a golden opportunity to tie it, when Procunier shot wide on a clean breakaway.

Disheartened by this, the Grads suffered a meltdown which PHE almost immediately capitalized on. A PHE winger, Walters, rocketed in and unleashed a slapshot which caromed from the goalie's pads right to Ackley who snapped it in to make it 2-0.

PHE got an unbeatable 3-0 lead and Ackley got a hat-trick on a strange goal that finished off the Grads. Walters broke in on the Grads' goaltender and was hauled down from behind. The referee signalled a delayed penalty and for some reason the whole Grads team thought the play was dead.

Walters, meanwhile, shovelled out the puck while he was lying on his back behind the net and Ackley, who happened to be standing there as usual, tapped it by the indifferent goalie. When the referee signalled a goal, the graduates looked incredulous and then skated away with an obvious show of self-disgust.

The semi-finals begin Wednesday night at the Arena when Law I meets PHE at 7 pm. PHE took a 5-2 decision over Law early in the season but in their second meeting, Law blew right by them, scoring four consecutive goals for a 6-4 victory.

The other semi-final matches New I against SMC A this Wednesday at 9 pm. (This game follows the Law-PHE game.) The teams tied 2-2 during their interlocking game this year.

Both semi-finals are a two-game total-goal affair, with the winners meeting in a series that begins March 18.

We can't tell you the results of the division II A & B playoffs because the game sheets haven't arrived in Miss Boyd's office yet.

Wrestlers do well

Two U of T wrestlers — Rob Moore and Steve Tisberger — demonstrated the metal that they're made of at the OUAA wrestling championships held at Western. Moore, wrestling in the 134 pounds class, and Tisberger in the 142 pounds class, both captured second places in their weight class.

Moore fought six times, pinned two opponents, gained major decisions (more than 12 points) on two others, won one straight decision, before being finally pinned by Dell Aguile of Ryerson.

Tisberger also fought six times, gaining three straight decisions and two major decisions against five of his opponents.

In his final fight, Tisberger met one of Canada's finest wrestlers, Egon Beilor of Waterloo. Beilor won a gold medal in the recent British Commonwealth games. After a hard fight, in which Tisberger scored the only points against Beilor during the meet, the Waterloo wrestler finally prevailed by a major decision.

Other U of T wrestlers who also competed in the championships were Roman Preobayzensky fourth in the heavyweight) and Walter Cringan (fifth in the 158 pound class).

The final team standings were Guelph 65, Western 54, Waterloo 43, Ryerson 26, Toronto 16, Ottawa and Windsor 10, RMC 4, and York and Queen's 2.

Egon Beilor was awarded the Kegan Trophy for being the meet's outstanding wrestler.

Women's interfaculty hockey season winds up play

By JANET CLARKE

In the closing weeks of women's interfaculty hockey play, A league PHE II defeated Meds II by default. Trin beat PHE 3-1 and Erin downed Vic 2-0.

SMC massacred the Meds 13-2. J. O'Hara led the scoring with 7 goals. The other six were evenly shared between Mary MacDonald, M. Fournier, and B. Gainther. Helen Lynn and I. Molz scored for the Meds.

PHE took their game with Vic 6-1. Sue Scott put in three goals for the Jocks. Betty Shostak (1) and Mary Lou Langton (2) brought the final score to six for PHE. Susie McLary was the lone Vic scorer.

After a scoreless first period with SMC, PHE II pulled up its socks to score three goals, one each for Carol McDougall, Pat Williams, and Jill Bennett. It wasn't until the third period that U. Ashton put SMC on the score board, but it was too late. PHE II took the game 3-1.

Meds II played Trin, but ended on the losing side of the 10-0 score. Trish Beck put in five goals. Dot Todd and Anne Steacy each scored two. Jill Houston finished off the Trin scoring.

In the B league, UC-Music played PHE II to a 0-0 score. Nursing-Pots lost to PHE I 2-0 and Innis tied New 2-2.

In the SMC-Vic game, Joni Yanch, assisted by Maureen Shrubsole, scored SMC's first goal at 2:35 of the first period. No one managed to change the score until 4:53 of the third, when Mary Jane Kearne, assisted by Maureen Hamen, made it 2-0 for Vic.

New's Heather McCullough was responsible for their 1-0 win over Trin. PHE II defaulted their game with the Nursing-Pots.

New 10 took UC-Music 1-0, in a combined effort from Cathy Fearnell and Barb McElroy which resulted in a goal by Heather Dubnie.

French journalist fights racism

By TIM GALLAGHER

"Racism and the fight against it is the history of my life," declared Guy Sitbon, a journalist for the Paris newspaper Le Nouvel Observateur, in an interview yesterday.

Sitbon, who describes himself as "a Tunisian Jew and anti-Zionist," is one of the speakers slated for the teaching on racism and the university being held today.

Involved in the cause for colonial liberation for many years, Sitbon has a rich experience to talk from.

Sitbon proof-read manuscripts for Franz Fanon's book, "The Wretched of the Earth," and was editor of "Jeune Afrique."

Sitbon noted: "The fight against racism here in Canada and elsewhere is imperative and fundamental to any political organization."

"The theories of doctors and psychologists, for example the Mediterranean syndrome, have a strong Nazi air about them because they are not abstract folk-lore but are being used by people of power with an ear to the government. You can't debate with them, you have to fight them."

Racist theories in French universities, he said, "could not exist since the revolts of '68."

"Such theories were eliminated by students of black, Arab, and French organizations who don't allow racist theories to be promulgated," he emphasized.

In explaining why he is here in Canada to speak Sitbon said he wanted to "learn of the Canadian situation ... and help Canadians become familiar with the forms and methods of fighting racism in France."

He said he wanted to know "how Canadians are fighting racism."

Also speaking at the teach-in is Roy Brown, a black worker, formerly a janitor at the University of Chicago.

Brown explained he did not have much of a formal education — "eight years of grade school" — but he read a lot and was concerned about racism.

Because of hard-work and deep commitment, Brown is now able to debate professors about "racist" theorists like Edward Banfield and Arthur Jensen.

He said people like Banfield "are the forerunners of Hitlerism as in Germany in the Twenties and Thirties."

To Brown all such theories are variations on the same theme — racism.

"Theories of Aryan superiority, blaming the victim, are not new," he said.

He pointed out: "People at the top of the ladder have always oppressed those at the bottom. Blacks at the top will exploit those at the bottom. The same for yellow and white."

As for academic freedom, Brown said there is "no such thing" and emphasized it is "hypocrisy to talk about academic freedom."

He maintained: "When people tell you to fight for freedom and justice, they are really telling you to stay in slavery, not to fight back."

"If we tell each other the same fairy tale we begin to believe it. Only people like Banfield benefit from this."

Brown expressed the hope the teach-in will allow people "to become aware of the strength and universality of racism, how widespread it is, and how their very survival depends on them fighting it."

He said: "People didn't fight against Hitler and his kind. They ignored him. Hitler was a capable man, but he was dangerous."

Another speaker, Grant Cooper, a member of the Progressive Labor Party, stated he came to the teach-in because he felt as a Communist, it was important to fight racism.

To Cooper, the major reason for fighting racism is "it justifies the most intense exploitation and oppression of minorities and by doing this it hurts all workers and divides them."

Currently Cooper is fighting for his professor's job at the University of Arkansas.

He has been given a year's notice, he said, by the administration.

When he started criticizing Edward Banfield's "The Unheavenly City" and advocating the removal of Banfield's books from the university, he was reprimanded by the university administration.

The Arkansas administration claimed Cooper "was not teaching from an institutional point of view."

Cooper believes Banfield "represents the new wave of academic racists."

Cooper said he believed he was being fired from the university "for both being a Communist and fighting racism."

"I've been told I don't teach from an institutional point of view... by implication racism is an institutional point of view and anti-racism is not," he said.

Support to retain Cooper has grown but Cooper explained the university and the local press are concentrating their attacks on him on the fact he is a Communist.

The teach-in at the U of T will also feature such people as Ashley Montagu, a famous anthropologist, and Charles Roach, a Toronto black immigration lawyer.

Business affairs sells property for $200,000

By BOB BETTSON

It wasn't another 188 Yonge but U of T has sold for $200,000 a chunk of land they inherited in a will to the Ontario government for an institute for the deaf.

The sale was approved yesterday at the meeting of the business affairs committee of Governing Council. There was no dissent.

Vice-president Alex Rankin said in a serious tone it would be a "pleasant to walk on a Sunday from the alcoholics to the deaf to the crippled to the blind." The land is presently the site of an alcoholics treatment centre, a CNIB centre, and a centre for paraplegics.

The land will be sold to the Ontario government with the provision it will revert to the U of T if not used for medical purposes. Rankin explained it did not have any market value because it can't be sold commercially.

The university got the land with this provision so it could be used for medical purposes and since then the CNIB and other organizations have occupied it.

The land is near Sunnybrook hospital. The provincial government apparently had $200,000 set aside for the blind and that is how the price was arrived at.

The committee also approved construction plans for both Scarborough and Erindale colleges. Erindale will begin construction almost immediately on a temporary office building to be converted in three years to a commercial or residential use.

The proposal for Scarborough is for increased library space, a lecture theatre, seminar rooms, a computer, office space, a language laboratory, study space, a bookstore, four squash courts, lounge and research study space.

The university has also agreed to waive the part of an agreement about parklands it owns behind Sunnybrook that would have made it responsible for creating a right of way for cars.

Rankin said Metro parks commissioner Tommy Thompson had decided there should not be access by car to the parklands because of the busy traffic on Bayview Avenue.

The committee also agreed to turn over the deed for the grave site of Sir Frederick Banting, discoverer of insulin which the modest tombstone (which has no mention of his great discovery, is placed.

Faculty discusses parity

The Faculty of Social Work met yesterday to decide on a course of action on student demands for parity.

The faculty are to present their decision to the students today.

Since last Thursday, teaching faculty have been meeting in six groups each one to discuss one demand of the student union.

A two-day boycott of classes held by the students this week, after negotiations with the faculty broke off, with the students claiming they had not received an adequate written reply from the faculty about their demands.

The students charged the faculty with being too slow in responding to negotiations.

The boycott was called as the only method to gain recognition, and speed up consideration of the student demands.

Students are now back at classes, and are to decide at their regular meeting next Tuesday how to respond to today's faculty position.

The first of the student demands was for a parity faculty council, composed of four students and four faculty members.

The students also called for a parity admissions committee: "Parity participation must be involved in the acceptance or rejection of each application for admission."

"Decisions of the admissions committee must be ratified by both the faculty and student constituencies."

The other demands of the students included restructuring of the class in professional values (students are planning to set up an alternate course to the professor-led groups presently offered); student records to be open for inspection by individual students on request; more flexibility in course choices; and no staffing or tenure decisions until student parity is implemented on all committees making those decisions.

The student union first made its demands January 30, and formed a committee February 5 to begin open negotiations.

The faculty appointed a committee of nine members to deal with the student demands February 8.

Students have claimed the present structure in the faculty allows them little say in decision making. Students presently have parity on policy committees, although they have claimed their input on these committee decisions has not been recognized.

Forgive him, dear, if he wants to possess
You more than you can squander of your time
On summer things like love, which merit less Than music and your art. His is the crime,
To covet more than keyboard and career,
Who, after all, are full and faithful friends,
Affording more affection than a year,
Within which love invariably ends.

What in God's name are you doing?

Some guys can go pelting down the Road of Life like an arrow. They never hesitate, never swerve, never even slow down.

But the rest of us get gnawed by these funny little questions. They come, unasked for, unwelcome and usually about two o'clock in the morning. They can stop you cold in your tracks. Samples: Is this all there is? If everything's working out for me, why am I bugged? What in God's name am I doing anyway?

If they persist, if they make you feel like some dim-wit robot programmed by someone else, maybe you should bless the questions, take advantage of the time-out, and think.

If you're asking yourself what in God's name you're doing, why not think about doing something in God's name?

Task Force studies discrimination

By KATHERINE ROWCLIFFE

The task force studying the status of non-academic female staff may not be too successful in improving existing policies of controlling discrimination, said director of U of T personnel Bob Brown.

"I don't think you can legislate out prejudice," he said, "but you can publicize what the university wants to achieve in the area of non-discrimination. In doing that you will bring pressures on people to do the right thing."

He said the personnel department is responsible for screening potential candidates for a job but the final hiring is done by the chairmen of departments.

Brown made the statement Wednesday afternoon at a meeting of the task force studying the status of non-academic female staff at U of T.

Women must be encouraged to expand their horizons if they hope to advance through administrative ranks at U of T, said Brown, but he went on to admit very few jobs in administrative positions are available for anyone.

Brown said the problem is partly structural because higher positions at U of T are shared by academic employees and professional specialists.

Many non-academic women employed at U of T lack the qualifications for these positions and cannot get the necessary experience in their present work.

In a report submitted to Governing Council in September, internal affairs vice-president Jill Conway and nutrition technician Gwen Russell stated:

"Although there appear to be many promotional opportunities open to women, the failure of the university to encourage 'career development' for its staff results in a practical barrier being erected in the path of many women and their desire to move upward within the university."

The task force will investigate allegations of "rug ranking" at U of T.

This involves secretaries being paid according to the responsibility of their bosses. No statistics on this are presently available.

The task force agreed upon its terms of reference at Wednesday's meeting.

Its general purpose is to "examine policies affecting the status of non-academic female staff, and where desirable to make recommendations for additions and improvements."

The example of a secretary who must accept a salary cut in certain lateral transfers was cited at Wednesday's meeting. The task force will examine relevant aspects of budgeting procedure.

Russell, a member of the task force, said the personnel department should have the authority to protect employees in such transfers.

Brown was hesitant, stressing control of the budget would be overstepping the role of the personnel department.

Student housing report questioned

By ART MOSES

A questionable government report on student housing will come under scrutiny in the Ontario Legislature, according to the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS).

Contents of the report were leaked to OFS last fall, causing outrage among Ontario student councillors.

The report included results of a survey of residence occupancy rates last year. The survey allegedly showed no new student residences were needed in Ontario.

Government officials conducted the survey in February, a time when residence vacancies are highest because of university drop-out rates.

A similar survey conducted by OFS last September revealed student residences were filled to capacity on all Ontario campuses except Laurentian University in Sudbury.

Former Minister of Colleges and Universities Jack McNie said in January he knew nothing of the report. OFS then wrote to opposition party leaders.

On Wednesday the student organization received a letter from New Democratic Party leader

Stephen Lewis in which he promised to raise the issue in the Ontario Legislature soon.

OFS is also upset the government survey did not question student attitudes toward the quality of residence facilities and determine why students left residences while remaining at university.

OFS is currently trying to expand its research, lobbying and communications capacity.

On Wednesday and Thursday U of T students are to vote on whether they approve of an increase in OFS fees from the present 40 cents per student to $1.50.

The increase would allow an increase in the OFS research and field staff. The organization now employs three staff members.

Toronto Sun Metals victim

Canada Metals, the east end lead producer is now going after four Toronto Sun journalists in addition to the five Globe and Mail and CBC employees already accused of contempt of court by the firm.

The Sun reporters are not being charged with contempt of court but are fighting a move for a court order to produce their files on Canada Metals for the company to examine.

The CBC and Globe personnel are now in the middle of a contempt of court case launched by Canada Metals charging them with violating an injunction gained to prevent the broadcast of "Dying of Lead" on the CBC radio show, As It Happens.

The new charges, latest in a long series in a bid to muzzle its critics, also ask for the Globe reporters to produce their files on Canada

Metals.

Last week Canada Metals and Toronto Refiners filed another motion which has not yet been granted to prevent the Toronto board of health and specifically Aldermen Dan Heap and Anne Johnston and expert Dr. David Parkinson from considering the Canada Metals case.

The board of health's normal function is to safeguard Toronto residents' health from such hazards as lead poisoning.

The companies were ordered in the health board controversy to produce reasons why they should prevent the further handling of the case by the board. The date has been set for April 16.

Gary Perly, chairman of the Canadian Liberation Movement had the charge by Canada Metals against him for contempt dismissed by the court because the metal firm did not prove Perly was involved in the production or distribution of an allegedly offending leaflet.

Despite the metals lawyers' contention the reason was a technicality and Perly had been "intimately" involved with the controversy, Mr. Justice Dennis O'leary threw the charges out.

The CBC lawyer has accused the metal companies of having a "grudge" match with the media in what is becoming a landmark censorship case.

He said the move by the companies to jail the reporters was an abuse of the process of the courts. Most of the battles have yet to be settled and there are no less than five different injunctions still to be

Prentice contests Governing Council seat

Physics professor Jim Prentice is contesting the Constituency 1 E seat in the present Governing Council elections. The constituency includes all teaching staff members in the Faculty of Arts and Science who hold their major appointments in the Departments of Astronomy, Chemistry, Computer Science, Geology, Mathematics, Physics, Botany, and Zoology. (The constituency excludes teaching staff members who hold their major appointments at Scarborough or Erindale Colleges.)

Prentice includes staffing policies, the status of women of the non-academic staff, and the discipline code among the "substantial policy issues involved in the current election."

Prentice is dissatisfied with the Forster Report's recommendations on staffing policies. He feels "insufficient attention is given to the present lack of well-defined appeal procedures for part-time or non-professional teaching staff whose employment is terminated. The present regulations do not permit the granting of tenure to part-time staff."

Prentice says "these situations tend to discriminate against women as they are at present more likely to hold part-time appointments than men."

A recent University of Toronto Faculty Association (UTFA) Newsletter gave the results of a questionnaire based on selected questions pertaining to the Forster Report.

The questionnaire found "half of all respondents are willing to see graduate students as members of tenure committees."

Thirty-six per cent of the respondents are willing to see undergraduate students on tenure committees. (These questions referred to Model III of the Forster Report tenure committee recommendations.)

Prentice also noted responses to Model II of the Forster Report—a variant of either Models Ia) or Ib)—came out 59 per cent in favour of having an untenured member of the "department concerned" on a tenure committee.

In the newsletter's preface to the questionnaire results, UTFA president W.H. Nelson said: "We think these results are numerous and representative enough to provide a measure of real evidence of what faculty members think about questions of appointment, promotion and tenure."

The questionnaire results are significant, Prentice feels, since they throw the weight of the Forster Report into some doubt. The Forster Report had recommended a conservative stand with respect to broadening the base of tenure committees, favoring the status quo over any more liberal structures.

Prentice thinks there must be "a gradual change for more students on decision-making bodies. Change should take place through departments. We have to get away from fighting over the numbers game of parity. To me, parity is the only thing that symbolizes to students that they'll be treated as equals. It's quite possible for students and faculty to work as equals," he believes, "in departments' governing structures without having a strictly equal number on all committees."

"It's important for students to identify where power lies and to see if they're able to have any power." Prentice mentioned the social work students' boycott of classes last Monday and Tuesday as one way students have of demonstrating power at the departmental level within a faculty.

"The social work students know they had no power on the old committees and applied pressure to change this situation."

Prentice believes the discipline code is "threatening to increase the tension between faculty and students. If we are to attract the best students, those of an independent mind, to U of T we must work to lessen the arbitrary distinctions between the various estates in the university rather than increase divisions between them."

Council election creates friction

The recent incomprehensible rejection of Laurence Colman's nomination to the Governing Council typifies a spirit of outright belligerence on the part of the election overseers.

It would appear the administration is willing to go out of its way to create out-right friction and hostility in its relations with students at this university. It is then, no wonder that a mere four students out of a possible 20,000 chose to seek an office where they will be in close contact with the administration.

What strikes me as being more indignant, however, is the administration attempt to make the election in Constituency 1 a no-contest election, by rejecting two of the nominees, thus having the two remaining nominees acclaimed.

The Governing Council has the authority to determine election procedures and call for nominations according to section 2 (14), but they seem to have bungled up the procedures for enacting and calling for such. By section 2 (15) of the University of Toronto Act (1971): "The Governing Council is required to pass by-laws regulating the exercise of its powers and the calling and conduct of its meetings and its decisions are required to be made by resolutions passed at its meetings." While it could conceivably enact retroactive by-laws (complying with section 76 of by-law 2), the election guideline approved by the resolutions of the Governing Council, as it now stands, contains no such by-law to regulate the manner, procedure, and conduct of elections. Thus, since it has not exercised these powers, there was, and is no authority whatsoever, to call for, OR REFLECT nominations. According to SAC lawyers, Osler, Hoskin, and Harcourt: "The Election Guidelines and Nomination Forms do not have the force of a by-law."

With regards to rejection of nominators, there exists no mention in the election guidelines drawn up in December 1973, concerning ATL numbers. However, refutes the election overseer, the nomination form is an extension of the guideline. This, apparently is not supported by the U of T Act, nor any other legislation I am aware of. Also of interest is the fact that there is no mention in regards to how a nominator must identify himself. Thus, the ATL number reflects only on the identity of the nominator, and not on his sincerity or validity, which to me seems to be the vital issue at hand.

Even if one were to disregard all the legal issues which are abundantly evident, one would have to consider the moral aspects involved. Colman, in good faith, filed his application on February 15 (4:30 pm), as was verified by the stamp affixed to it by the Governing Council Secretary. The nominations were closed on February 18. However, not until February 22, did Colman receive any indication of his rejection. This subversive behaviour becomes highly suspicious when one notes the following quote in Election Guidelines: "The Office of the Governing Council will attempt to notify candidates of any errors prior to the close of nominations." Although the controversial term "will attempt" in no way denotes "must", the fanatic obsession with details is inescapable. To further illustrate the wrongdoing being perpetrated on Colman, the Secretary of the Governing Council has already accepted full responsibility for the error and has apologized for it. All to no avail, for the Election Overseers seem set in their ways. Thus, in Colman's words, "the quantity of error is the same, while the quality seems irrelevant."

I object to the Governing Council treatment of Laurence Colman not only on legal grounds, but on moral grounds as well. There comes a time in every organization's existence when the pettiness should be set aside in order to establish a truly harmonious faculty-student relationship. While I, in no way condone unilateral dismissal of principles and constitutions to stretch rules, I feel this case to be highly questionable, if not exceptional action on the part of Governing Council.

Should one not, at times, look within himself and consider whether minutia of detail are always more important than a human being?

I, therefore call on the Governing Council, the Election Overseers, and all involved parties to reconsider their highly unfavourable decision and prove to the constituents of this university, that at times, people do mean more than a few petty details.

Racism to keep Jewish vote

A new kind of racism is creeping into our midst. This is evidenced by the irregularities in the nominations for the upcoming Governing Council elections. Why was Laurie Colman's nomination for student governor refused? The answer is obvious. Howard Levitt, a present student governor, has been actively campaigning for his good friend Howard Stein. In order to insure Stein's election, Levitt decided it imperative the Jewish vote not be split. To do this he and his cohorts used their influence to quash Laurie Colman's nomination.

This despicable tactic seems to be in conflict with Stein's platform which calls for an investigation into racism within the university. We hear a lot about corruption in high places and the need for a new awareness and a new morality in politics. Should the U of T be an exception? Lets clean up our own act!

I for one won't be voting for Howard Stein.

Students won't participate without parity power

The situation in the faculty of Arts and Science has rapidly deteriorated since the parity struggle in 1970-71. Last week I learned I and approximately 26 other students were acclaimed to posts on the faculty's general committee.

There were 22 vacancies out of 49 students seats on the 200 member committee. Supposedly the faculty council is the governing body in the faculty dealing with grading, curriculum and policy matters.

This points out very graphically that without parity students know there is no power. They have not participated to any degree in what has become an increasingly irrelevant body.

As a member of the Arts and Science Student Union executive, I challenge Dean Greene and the faculty council, in conjunction with ASSU and the Governing Council to restructure the council on a smaller scale with parity student-faculty representation.

This was recommended by the non-student dominated Beryne Committee which came to understand the general committee is an irrelevant and unworkable body.

In 1972-73 the general committee spent three meetings on the question of library amalgamation without coming to any conclusions. Debate was long-winded and useless. The Governing Council gave up waiting for the committee's comment and made the decision anyway.

Otherwise, the committee merely rubber-stamped Curriculum changes with a few housekeeping motions. Then the Beryne Report was discussed. This report was the work of a balanced committee with student, faculty and alumni representation.

It seemed to me most of the changes made were regressive and inhibited the reformist stance. On the credit system, the conservative faculty members, which tend to gravitate toward this committee, were defeated in their bid to retreat in the name of academic standards.

The many decisions were made while students were off campus in May. Many student members, myself included, were unable to attend, because of job commitments.

The committee's main work this year has been occupied with going through the Beryne implementation committee. Though approved with few changes, the report was the main topic of interminable meetings dominated by a few die-hards such as history chairman J. B. Conacher.

Nothing else has been discussed. Now they are trying to revive a new version of honors to bring back academic standards, whatever they are.

A motion by Gord Barnes and myself calling for faculty-wide discussion on staffing and parity as well as restructuring has been shunted to the bottom of the agenda of three successive meetings. This proves they don't care about students.

I challenge Dean Greene to begin negotiations with the ASSU and the Governing Council to rectify this intolerable situation.

In 1970, students voted 88 per cent in favor of parity representation on the council. We renew that call. Without parity, the committee will continue to be a home for worn-out academics, not responsive to the needs of students in Arts and Science.

Some proposals I would like to offer for reform are:

- The immediate setting up of a parity committee of staff and students, not necessarily made up of the general committee, to look into restructuring proposals. This committee would include deans, departmental chairmen, course union representatives and ASSU representatives.

- This committee would study the formation of a unicameral 50-member council with curriculum and evaluation subcommittees to improve the functioning of governing structures in the faculty.

- That all the curriculum committees be abolished along with the setting up of a reformed committee on standing and abolition of the all-faculty academic standards committee.

- That students have parity representation on all bodies in the faculty. That departmental assemblies be set up on a parity basis to report to the faculty council. This would remove some of the present authority from the department chairmen.

- That students be elected to council, not by mailed ballot but as representatives. Now the elections or more appropriately, annual acclamations, are a farce.

- That Dean Greene make a positive response to these and other proposals that have come from student groups and try to ensure there is positive discussion and action.

One must admit if adopted these changes would make a revolutionary change in the governance of the faculty. I offer them as something ASSU and other student groups can organize around. We are under no illusions about the faculty's position. Apart from the minority of reform faculty, most professors are not prepared for student power in determining their own education.

It is through the faculty and the course unions the change will come. Other than university issues such as discipline, and to some extent staffing, decisions are made in the department and the faculty.

It is ironic the largest faculty in the university, whose students are mainstream of SAC, should ignore the opportunities to organize for change in their own faculty.

It is only through grass roots action change will come. Students have to be confronted and politicized on issues that directly affect their lives.

The ASSU has not been a success in our two years of existence. We have served as a bureaucratic clearing house for course union activity with a fieldworker who has acted as a bureaucrat.

Of course, if more people would get involved we might get somewhere. The executive is made up of Rick Gregory, Ellen Pomer, Brian Doherty and myself. We are reachable through our east lounge Sid Smith Office. We'd like to hear from the people we get our money from, you the students.

SAC veteran Kanowitch heads slate

SAC veteran Seymour Kanowitch is running for the SAC presidency on a platform containing many kinds of wood.

Student services, parity, the discipline code, university budget cuts, the status of women and relationships with the suburban campuses all have found their way into his program.

The fourth-year UC student has brought in SAC rep Tim Buckley (Eng II) and newly-returned Scarborough student Fred Stewart to round out his slate.

Kanowitch feels SAC should undertake a "fullscale survey of opinions about existing campus services and initiate action where it's needed."

The three members of the ticket all believe SAC should be willing to fund groups of students who develop specific ideas on improving campus services.

The Kanowitch-Buckley-Stewart team wants to investigate complaints already made about the U of T Health Service and food services. They feel "SAC should pressure the university to invite" private concerns, skilled in the art of nutritious food preparation, to operate on campus.

As services commissioner this year Kanowitch obtained a report on existing campus food services and found the quality of food astonishingly low in such long-suspected "good value" places as the Arbor Room.

Kanowitch brought back the SAC pub this year to a new location — the Engineering Annex. Unfortunately, the pub has faded from view, largely as a result of that old favorite pastime, student apathy.

SAC's film series in Med Sci Auditorium has fared better, however.

Kanowitch was one of the architects of the SAC policy on the discipline code, and in an interview, went to great lengths to defend that position.

If elected, he says he plans to call a conference in May of COPOUT, the council of student council presidents, to begin organizing against the non-academic discipline code which is likely to remain suspended until January.

He says he is sure it will remain suspended "because the administration is aware students are unusually united in opposing it."

He defends the SAC position of negotiating the academic section of the code into effect because "the essence of the Conway-Cadario code is eliminated."

He also used the "elimination of the essence" argument to defend the SAC position of negotiating the code when more than 3,000 students had signed petitions opposing it.

The "essence" which SAC eliminated, Kanowitch said, was the intent to put down student demonstrations in the non-academic code, then the legitimization of committees with few if any students and the overkill in library rules.
